Buelph Evening Mercury

SATURDAY EV'G, AUGUST 8, 1868

- Fare thee we'l, thou sacred threshold, Where my lovely maiden dwelt; Fare thee well thou spot so sacred, Where my eyes her first be held.
- Had I never seen thy beauty, My heart's beauteous, fairy queen, Never con'd it then have happened That so sorrowful I'd been.

- But thou wouldst that I shouldst leave thee, Bitter words thy lips expressed; Frency rages in my senses, Sadly is my heart distressed.
- And, with drooping heart and spirit,
 I go hence my passion's slave,
 Till I lay my weary body
 In a cold and distant grave.

The Braes of Yarrow

Sir Walter took the paper, and, despite himself, his hand shook slightly. He read—
'My good friend and dear lover, Gilbert Elliot, greeting.—Dear heart, why should you risk your life and my hope in this contest with Tushielaw? Should you be victor that will not bring the dead to life; should you fail, the shame which now lies upon us will be confirmed for eve. I would have you live for the sake of one who loves you more than all the world beside. Wherefore, I pray you, pause, and go not into battle.—M. S.
It was with difficulty that the belief.

more than all the world beside. Wherefore, Irray you, pause, and go not into battle.—
If was with difficulty that the knight suppressed a cry of pain. The letter was writely his wife—it was no counterfeit he could have sworn and it gave a terrible confirmation to all that it is the had said. He had discredited him all along, or he had found some probable explanation for all that was imputed this lady. But now with the suppression of the world beside? There was no explanation, no argument that he could he find the said of the sake of one who loves you more than all the world beside? There was no explanation, no argument that he could be find to alter the conclusion to which the mind each of the sake of one who loves you more than all the conclusion to which the mind said of the said of th till she herself told him that it was no longer his. He would forget the dream. He drew the mask over his face again, closed the window, and returned to the invalid's couch.

Were you ill?' asked the latter faintly. Spens answered calmly.

'I fancied I heard some one outside there, and desired to assure myself that there was no spy observing us. I pray you be brief with what remains to tell.'

Few words will serve. When that letter came into my hands I thought of delivering it to him for whom it was intended. Before I could accomplish that I learned that Spens still lived.'

'What then?'

'I donned the pilgrim's garb in which you found me, and resolved to seek him through the land by night and day so that I might acquaint him with the danger which his generous heart could never have suspected. For weeks I have been seeking him; but in vann. Three days ago sickness seized me, and when struggling to reach this house to crave help I fell where you found me, help-less and dying.'

'I have finished! I pray you to take up the work which I have left undone. Seek the brave Knight of Halstane and acquaint him with all that I have related to you.'

'Be sure that he shall know all.'

'Then I am satisfied to die now.'

'Should you live, I will send you some token when the task is completed.'

'The Holy Mother's blessing be with you; for I can only hope for pardon through my exertions to atone for the past.'

'Good night.'

Ritchie caught Sir Walter's hand and pressed it to his lips with every appearance of humble gratitude. Spens somewhat abruptly drew his hand away and quitted the room.

Pressed it to his lips with every appearance of humble gratitude. Spens somewhat abruptly drew his hand away and quitted the room.

The pilgrim lay for several minutes watching the door. A strange grin as of triumph slowly dawned upon his face, the sunken eyes brightened, and at length he gave vent to a low chuckle of impish delight.

'Wong' he muttered, 'won, by the mass. Now, let me see the loss and gain. It was he himself who has been with me. Then this how, te me see the loss and gain. It was he himself who has been with me. Then this is his hiding place. He did not believe which I told him, but he felt it, and betrayed himself. It will work upon him do what he will, that letter will poison his rest and make him hate the man who would have been of most service, to him. Well, they will meet, perhaps fight, and one will fall. I do not care which. What next? in any case he will say nothing of Birrum for a while, and in that while the lordship will be mine. He draw his hand meditatively over his tangled beard and again laughed.

Whatsomes next? Why, that if Tushic-law be note a bigger dolt than I take him to be we may ride our quarry down ere another sunset.

He half rese in the bed, and, bending forward toward the door, and listened.

There was no sound to indicate the applement of any one.

The pretended invalid stepped stealthily out of bed, and secured the door by placing one of the chairs against it in such a way that the latch rested upon the back and so rendered the door fast.

He stenued over to the window, threw it

He stepped over to the window, threw it open, and looked out. He gave vent to a peculiar sound like the tu-whit tu-whoo of the

A few minutes passed; the wind swept moaning by him and blew coldly in upon him Then from no great distance came what, might have been the echo of the owlish sound.

He repeated it once, then leaned over the window ledge.

'Deil's bird,' he said in a low voice.

'Here, 'respended some one from below. 'Hark, and mind well. The prey is here; the word is,' the night is dark, and the answer, 'dawn approaches.' Get the place surrounded and we win everything.

'A' rieht.'

The false pilgrim stealthily closed the window, withrew the chair from the door, sliped into bed, and was as faint and helpless as man might be—in appearance—when the friars returned to tend him.

MOTE.—The above Goods were never sold in the Town of Guelph at such a sacrifice in price. Every one shave already been informed, says the Beacon, of the seizure of this establishment. It was, however, allowed to continue in operation on the deposit of $4000 to the credit of the Receiver General, and security being given for the balance of the appraised value of the plant and stock—in all, $5,360. No decision was given in the case until recently, when the authorities decided to exact the full amount as above stated. We understand Mr. K. Jas paid the balance.
