COUSIN MAY'S DOWRY,

"You must know the road passing well to venture in it in such darkness," I said, as we moved in this order down the hill. "It is a terrible road at the best of times."
"Why, when did you last cross it?" asked causeway, the ghostly forebotings, of which I heard so long ago ringing down the coming years, was indeed the signal of death and destruction to that dark, evil house and its inhabitants.

"Who is this woman?" asked the chief of the party, as we continued to advance, old Meg clinging tightly to my hand, and pressing it at intervals to her withered lips, while tears streamed down her wrinkled-cheeks. I explained to him her position in the household, and readily undertook to be responsible for her appearance when and where it should be necessary.

"Halt here!" he said, when we had arrived at the end of the causeway, and only the river rolled between us and the Grange.
"How many men are there in the place?"
Meg, to whom this question was addressed, with difficulty abstracted her attention from the one absorbing fact of my safe return sufficiently to understand, and answer:

"Why, when did you last cross it?" asked my original questioner, who was walking close at my right hand.

"More than ten years ago."

"Ten years! Whew!" cried the man. You do not know, then, that within the last two years they have built a stone road upon piles and brushwood across the bad part to the river bank north of the house?"

"No," I exclaimed. "Have they dared?"

"Dared!" echoed the man, "you may well say that. There are few things in heaven or earth, or hell below for that matter, that John o' Compton would not dare, as you should know, if you are acquainted with him."

He went on to ask me a series of seem-"Going home, eh?" some fellow "mutual" said the other night to the pessimist for pleasure. "You can't go home; how can a fellow like you have a home?" "Home," replied the P., with dignity, "is where I keep my other clothes."

Peculiarities of the Hair.

There are times when all persons require to pay some particular attention to the hair. To rekindle the life and energy of the roots is a simple matter it taken in time. Dr. Dorenwend's Great German Hair Magle will do the work. It works in accordance with nature, supplies fresh nourishment to the gands, keeping the hair luxuriant and natural in shade. He went on to ask me a series of seemingly careless questions as to my connection with Connington Grange and its inmates, to all of which, though I perceived that he was sounding me, I answered truthfully and explicitly, having no reason for keeping the facts of my sojourn there from him, being anxious rather to convince him of my entire candor and credibility. Gradually he relaxed his suspicious attitude, and by the time we had got into the lower levels seemed quite satisfied.

Day had dawned by that time, and there was already sufficient cold gray light for me founded with common Cathartic or Purgative Pills, as they are entirely unlike them in every respect. I learned from my somewhat reticent friend that a long series of daring outrages and evasions of the excise had culminated in cold-blooded murder of an officer, and it was supposed to be done by John o' Compton and Stephen Ashland, for his body had been found with the throat cut, cast ashore been found with the throat cut, c

"I must ask you to dismount here, if you please," said the man, as we arrived at the beginning of the stonework. "There is need to announce our approach more than is necessary."

I explained that, owing to my fall, I was unable to walk without intolerable agony, and as the man seemed to still nurse some doubts, and to be unwilling to leave me to myself, it was decided, after some discussion, that I should be allowed to continue as I was.

"Depend upon it," said one man, "John o' Compton knows as much about it as we do by this time."

"Aye, and more too, or I'm much mistaken," chimed in another, but in spite of these assurrances I observed that the clatter of my limping hores' hoofs upon the uneven stones drew more than one disapproving glance from the members of the heart of the heard which a so ther medy for diarrhoad. 25c. a bottle.

During an examination in a Scotch school that sound before? What dim, unseizable recollections did it call up in my mind?

"Look out, men, there is some one coming from the house!" The voice of the leader in sharp accents suddenly broke in upon my reveric, and the band halted in some consternation. Far away a figure, dark against the now refulgent horizon, could be seen speeding towards us, its garments fluttering in the brisk sea breeze.

"Bah! 'tis only a woman," said another, and the march was resumed.

Nearer and nearer she came, until she was absorbed into the ranks of the advance guard, some 100 yards ahead.

"Wha is it? Wha is it? Let me gang till him," I heard her saying eagefly to the men who were conducting her back to the man body, and I knew the voice to be old Meg's.

"Wha are ye mon?" she said making.

"Wha are ye mon?" she said making. During an examination in a Scotch school the examiner asked the question: "When does mortification ensue?" One of the pupils, more clever than the rest, martly answered: "When you pop the question and are answered no."

"Come, come, John o' Compton," replied the other; "cease this fooling. Thy time has come, my man, late as it is, and there is more for you to answer than you will care to meet."
