Throughout the Russo-Japanese war alert military men of all progressive nations have been on the lookout for pointers that may be of use to them n the reorganization and training of their own forces. One of the principal essons is that mobility is perhaps the most essential qualification necessary to the success of an army. This lesson is by no means a new one. Century after century it has been taught upon all the famous battlefields that have strewn old mother earth with the corpses of the slain and have made the history of nations. All else being equal, mobility insures the highest power of aggressiveness in attack and the highest power of self-protection in retreat. The Greeks at Marathon overame vastly superior numbers because them down into the plain to attack a stationary force. The hosts of Darius were in a selected and prepared position when they were attacked and overthrown by the small army of Alexander at the battle of Arbela. The Carthaginians endeavored to save their city by occupying chosen positions to cover it and they were worsted in a succession of engagements at his target. the Romans under Regulus, when Xanthippus taught them the value of mobility and under his leadership they the small arms factory at Enfield, attacked and defeated the legions on the plains. The wars of the ages teach the same lesson; whenever to keep the machinery, stationary one, and other conditions all the small arms for the army shall 2.
