

News of Men In Training For Great War

29TH BATTERY TO BE HERE MONDAY

Advance Party at Least Will Be Under Canvas Early Next Week.

STAFF NOT ANNOUNCED

Absence of Artillery Officers Here Means No Local Appointments.

The advance party of the 29th Field Artillery, C. E. F., which is now being recruited in this military division will likely arrive in London on Monday. It will go under canvas on Carling's Heights with the infantry brigade, and will be camped to the west of the 33rd lines.

Major Coghlan, Guelph, selected as the officer commanding this new battery, will come in with his men. The staff of the battery will not be announced until after his arrival and until such time as the list has been given over by Col. L. W. Shannon, D. O. C. There are no artillery officers in the city, all those resident here having volunteered for active service, and now being either in England or on the firing line in France. The fact means that there will hardly be any local appointments. There are a number of cavalry officers who have volunteered for service with the artillery, but it is doubtful whether these will be accepted as they are not qualified artillery officers.

Arrangements for the horses, horse lines, and so on, are being rapidly completed, and it is expected that within a fortnight at least the new battery will be fully organized, equipped and in course of training already well under way.

Reports from the entire district indicate that the response to the call for artillery recruits has been met with the expected ready response.

Formerly no citizens have been allowed inside the camp grounds before 2 p.m. on Sundays.

BATTLE OF WATERLOO FOUGHT HUNDRED YEARS AGO TODAY! STORY OF TERRIFIC FIGHT THAT ENDED NAPOLEON'S CAREER

THIS is the centenary of the battle of Waterloo. Just 100 years ago today Napoleon Bonaparte, the most famous man in history saw his magnificent infantry, his dashing cavalry sacrificed by little charges, and even the marvelous Old Guard cut to ribbons.

Long before the battle was over Napoleon foresaw his doom. He knew the day was lost the moment his cavalry ran wild under the impetus of Marshal Ney and threw themselves upon an avalanche of horses into the phalanx of British. Twelve times did these 15,000 men and 12,000 horses, the finest cavalry in the world, rally and dash anew into the solid lines of the foe, only to be annihilated without routing the allies. As a sight of military grandeur nothing in battlefield history has rivaled it.

"Who ordered that charge?" demanded Napoleon as he saw from afar the horsemen poised for the word of command. "It is an hour too soon."

His personal aide, Count Bertrand, dashed off to recall them but already the great line of plunging steeds was rushing toward the enemy. He was too late.

"All is lost," he declared as he gazed in regret at the dashing regiments. Just as treachery had contributed to his defeat and forced him into exile, after he had all of Europe at his feet, so did lack of obedience and poor judgment on the part of his general in the bud his return to power.

Allies Form for Battle. Between 7 and 8 o'clock of June 18 he discovered Wellington arranging his army in order of battle. The rain which came down all night ended at this time. Before 9 o'clock the Emperor again inspected his lines.

The attack was postponed on the advice of the artillery officers who wished the ground to be in better condition for their guns. Wellington had the stronger position and prepared to defend it until Blucher could join him. Wellington had 49,000 infantry, 12,400 cavalry and 5,645 artillerymen with 156 guns. Napoleon had 48,950 infantry, 15,765 cavalry and 7,232 artillery with 246 guns.

Bonaparte's plan of battle was to have Ney open the engagement at 1 o'clock in the afternoon with an attack calculated to place the latter in the possession of the village of Mont-Saint-Jean in the rear of the allies. But the first shots were fired before this time, when Prince Jerome's division was hurled at Hougomont. The assault began before noon and failed. Two more divisions were wasted in the attempt.

During this time a heavy artillery fire was being directed at the exposed centre of the allies' line and at 1:30 the first corps in close formation attacked and easily routed the pivot brigade of the British. But the French met a terrific infantry fire from a division behind a ridge and when charged by cavalry were driven back in confusion.

Napoleon at this time discovered the advance guard of Bulow's Prussian division in the hills a few miles away and dispatched a corps to hold them in check. He also sent a dispatch to the wandering Grouchy and his 33,000 men who were seeking Blucher, ordering him to return, but this Grouchy did not receive until evening.

An assault on La Haye Sainte, distinguished by its El management and madness, occupied most of the afternoon. At dusk the house was taken. At this time Ney went wild, so to speak, and regardless of the protests of the cavalry generals who looked upon his proposal as folly, he gathered all their horsemen for the magnificent but futile charge related above.

Time after time Ney sent his raging horsemen over the artillery of the enemy and into its phalanxes beyond. The carnage was fearful. Bodies lay everywhere. And when at length the cuirassiers were compelled to retreat for the twelfth time the British rushed forward to their deserted guns and poured a terrific fire of grape shot into the brave horsemen.

That brilliant attack cost 4,000 of the French cavalry, while 10,000 English cavalry and infantry had laid down their lives.

Ney, the fearless, was everywhere. Five horses were shot from under him, and even when the arrival of Blucher's 31,000 fresh troops scattered the exhausted French in disorder, he gathered up companies and battalions and rushed ferociously at his foe.

It was a drawn battle—until the arrival of Blucher. Through the dust in the distance Napoleon saw the columns approaching. Was it Grouchy or Blucher? The day hinged on the question. It was Blucher and Wellington's battle. Even then Napoleon's strategy and cunning did not desert him. He sent out the word along the French line that Blucher was retreating before Grouchy. Stirred by this, the French launched new attacks and thousands more of the enemy fell.

But hope was gone. Napoleon retreated within a square of the old guard, a comparative handful of men. The rest of the famous imperial guard was hurled at the British, who for the first time in the day had begun to advance. Wellington had given his famous order: "Up guards, and at them." The French were in utter rout. The French line that Blucher was retreating before, on foot, hatless and with his sword in the air, collected 25,000 veterans and attacked the oncoming regiments. His men were dashed to ribbons.

Four battalions of the old guard were the only unbroken troops of the French army. Napoleon had relied upon them to cover the retreat of his scattered forces. Wellington, on foot himself, led the attack on them. From this comes the stirring phrase: "The old guard dies, but does not surrender."

Napoleon Flees to Paris. This was the last battle of the old guard was destroyed—but not defeated. Reduced to 150 men they were called upon to surrender. "We will not yield," they replied, and made a final charge on the cavalry of the British, killing many horses and men, then sinking to the earth to die.

Marshal Ney was with them to the last, fighting like a common soldier, slinking right and left with his sword. As he remarked to a general when his marvelous charge failed that it was either death at Waterloo or before a firing squad in Paris. The latter was his fate.

The Prussians pursued the French stragglers far into the night, cutting them down without mercy. Many veterans killed themselves, knowing no quarter would be granted them. At 11 o'clock the retreating Napoleon made a brief halt at Genappe to rally his forces, but without avail. He returned to Paris, and a few days later, June 22, was compelled to abdicate. This ended the "hundred days" of Napoleon's second reign. A few days later he was aboard a British frigate with the rock of St. Helena decided as his place of captivity.

To Make Hairs Vanish From Face, Neck or Arms

Keep a little powdered delatone handy and when hairy growths appear make a paste with some of the powder and a little water, then spread over hairy surface. After 2 or 3 minutes rub off, wash the skin, and it will be entirely free from hair or blemish. This simple treatment is infallible, but care should be exercised to be sure and get genuine delatone, otherwise you may be disappointed.—adv.
