

leans, Pointe Levi and below the Falls of Montmorency: at the Attack on the French Entrenchments at Beauport, the Landing at Wolfe's Cove (le Foulon or Fulling-Mill) and on the Plains, or "Heights of Abraham." The name or number of each Ship and Regiment of the French and English Forces is marked at the respective positions they occupied at different dates; and various names of localities are preserved which have fallen into disuse. The Plan is on a scale of 800 feet to an English inch. The Surveys were the work of Captain DEBEIG, of the Engineer in Ordinary, and Captains HOLLAND and DESBARRES of the Royal American Engineers, all of WOLFE's Army.

The references on the Map are a description of the Field Works of the French and a short Account of the Battle on the Plains, given with perfect exactness; even the hour of the different movements and the character of the different firings are recorded. No description of WOLFE's Campaign at Quebec, could give so accurate an idea of it as is derived from this Plan, and without it the best description would be very imperfect.
