Education, is scheduled to start next September and is expected to take at least five years.

Its aims are:

To determine the abilities and personal characteristics associated with success and failure in high school, in various occupations and in institutions of higher learning;

To determine the proportion of able students who do not receive education to the limit of their ability and the resultant loss to the Canadian society and to themselves;

To throw new light on why students, especially those with marked intellectual ability, leave high school before completing their courses and determmne how such talented young persons could be encouraged to continue their education;

To suggest means for overcoming barriers to higher education for those able to profit by it, especially where the barriers are financial, and help determine requirements for an adequate bursary and scholarship programme;

To discover and develop better instruments for identifying and measuring abilities and personal characteristics with occupational and educational success;

To improve admission requirements of universities and other educational institutions so those with qualities apparently needed for so those with qualities apparently needed for success could be admitted freely, while those lacking such qualities could be discouraged; To reorganize high school programmes to meet more adequately the known needs of all types of students, and further define the educational needs of yound persons of above average ability but not of university calibre or inclination;

To further strengthen democracy through the development of able potential leaders while avoiding the risk of warping and frustrating those with brilliant minds who feel they have never had a chance.
