of the greatest war in history. Nevertheless, a departure. tution is always a serious thing, and may have ill results that are not al-ways anticipated. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, looking at the matter with the ex-perienced eye of a veteran statesman, was extremely dubious about the ex-tension. He dwelt upon the immense importance of the control of the people over parliament and the control of parliament over the extension. The wartimes election act was a controversial measure. It was such a measure as would have borne the brand of extreme partisanship even if passed in a parliament with a clear man-date from the people. It was doubly unjustifiable when passed by a parlia-ment drawing its extension of life from an understanding that the only purpose was to allow the war to b prosecuted without the interruption of general election and restricted its powers. Do you suppose that Sir Wilfrid Laurier would have dreamed of granting the extension if he had been told how it would be abused? If Sir Robert Borden had said to him in 1916: 'Next year we shall use the power you have given us to pass a measure which will enable us to entrench ourselves in office for another parliament, to make this extension not for one year only, but for that year and the whole term of a parliament; we will disfranchise great bodies of electors, we will create such machinery for carrying on the general elec-tion as will make it impossible for Liberals to be elected, except where the majority is overwhelming, we will enact such a law for taking soldiers' votes that these votes may be trans-ferred in bundles to any constituency where the government needs them, the question answers iself: The extension would have been refused. It was passed by a most drastic use of the closure in parliament. And to that breach of faith, to that viola-tion of the constitution of Canada, the present parliament and the present government owe their life. Parliament Was Ignored. "The character of the government is just what might have been expected from its origin. Men do not gather
