THE MAGIC MUSICIAN.

(By Stuart B. Stone.)

Francis, first violin at the gilded Belvedere, had two precious secrets: one was warm, Gallic humor. The first of these was known only to a very proud, ancient family upon the vineyard banks of the Loire; the second was really no secret at all—Francis told the beautiful story in the wailing, pleading tones of his beloved Strad every night to the gay parties that thronged the Cafe Belvedere. This was his love for the lady of the lavender orchard.

Francis had singled her out one night when her party was the merriest of the time. Madame of the lavender plume, when the others joined in the applause, had said, "merely good."

The next night Francis fixed his bright, brown eyes upon Madame and rendered "The Cavalier's Golden Dream." Madame, who was very sensitive to these things, dropped just one little, unbidden tear upon her lobe, according to Newburg. Francis saw, and dreamed of her that night in his tiny, tenth floor garret.

After that the secret ceased to be a secret. Madame came nightly with her grand friends. After a bit, in his ardent ecstasy, he would advance and face his lady forgetting the crowd and Josef and Paul and the other musicians. Finally the great news came to Francis from across the sea, bearing a crest of ancient honor. The first prelude secret was ready for the greedy world.

Then Francis came down to the Cafe Belvedere in a rented dress suit of extraordinary splendor. When Madame came with her friends, he stepped out upon the floor and played as even he had not played before. It was "The Sad Heart's Message," and the striding called and allured and beckoned to Madame until she half arose from her chair. Francis saw and came near.

"Oh, Madame—come, please!" She followed him, while the crowd applauded and behind a friendly pair, Francis halted. "Madame," he said, simply, "I love—It is you whom I love!"

"Ah!" sighed Madame, reaching out her hands to him. Then she drew back. "What do you mean?" she demanded.

Francis bright eyes fairly burned. "I have loved you since I was a child," he questioned. "Madame, who is rich and poor?"

Then he conducted Madame back to the curious diners, to hear of the countless toasts of the orchestra.

AMUSEMENTS.

NICKEL'S PROGRAMME EXTRA-ORDINARY.

The picture feature now being presented at the Nickel are away and beyond anything shown in the house for some time. The new scenes and photographs at Biarritz in Francis on the Bay of Biscay are truly magnificent. It is travel picture entertainment of this sort that makes the Nickel of such real educational merit. The Gold Prospector is a pathetic drama of the American west—a unique film in this regard and gorgeously colored. The Abyss is a story of Russian intrigue and life among the Nihilists. The Nickel is a big hit. Last night he had to respond to four encores and even the people were not satisfied. Tonight the great juggler, continues to bring tons of applause at every performance. His is one of the best novelty juggling acts that has been here for a long time. The picture programme is also something different, as well. In all the programme will be almost an hour long.

The vaudeville acts showing at the Princess today are a decided novelty. Emil Chevrolet the solo and trick violinist, is a big hit. Last night he had to respond to four encores and even the people were not satisfied. Tonight the great juggler, continues to bring tons of applause at every performance. His is one of the best novelty juggling acts that has been here for a long time. The picture programme is also something different, as well. In all the programme will be almost an hour long.

Madame, who was crying again, shook her head. "Oh, can't you understand," she whispered. "I could love you to madness—you with your strange soulful chords and artist's temperament. But it lent the way of the world, Francis."

Francis snatched the strings of the precious Strad. "See," he cried, "so is my life—like a broken string."

Francis had singled her out one night when her party was the merriest of the time. Madame of the lavender plume, when the others joined in the applause, had said, "merely good."
