

A Brief for "Beaver" Flour

"Beaver" Flour

1. Get more bread made from BEAVER FLOUR and less yeast, and you will be better nourished, at the same time reducing the cost of living.
2. No special pastry flour is needed, for BEAVER FLOUR makes the best pies, cakes, biscuits and rolls.
3. It contains the valuable gluten and proteid constituents of Manitoba No. 1 Hard Wheat, but makes finer, whiter bread than if made from that alone.
4. It owes its delicacy and lightness to the carbohydrate constituents of Ontario Wheat in just the right proportions, but is more nourishing than if made from that alone.
5. It readily takes up water, and makes larger loaves and more of them.
6. It tickles the palate of the whole family, and does them good.
7. A few good reasons are as good as a thousand, so we will now, Your Honor, rest our case.

Be sure to note that the decision is for BEAVER FLOUR, with the costs assessed to those who do not use it.

"Tell Him I Loathe Him."

CHAPTER XXIII.

'AN ETERNAL FAREWELL.'

BEFORE he could restrain her she had passed her lips passionately upon his hand and was gone.

At the door of the inn she met Charlie Quintard.

'I was just going to look for you, Virginia,' he said gently. 'Luncheon is ready, and you know we start immediately after for Liverpool.'

'I shall be ready,' she answered quietly. 'But I shall go no further than London at present, Charlie.'

He started ever so slightly.

'Why?' he asked.

'I have just been speaking of the trouble into which poor France is thrown. You know what we owe her as a nation, I am going to do what I can to pay the debt. I shall offer myself as a nurse.'

'Virginia!'

She raised her head wearily.

'Don't try to discourage me, I beg of you. It would be useless, but I do not feel equal to a struggle.'

He was silent for a moment, gazing at her in a dumb, curious way; then:

'I shall follow you,' he said doggedly.

'You?'

'Yes. Not for the love of France, but for the love of you. You do not forbid it?'

She held out her hand, and pressed his in silence.

'I wish I deserved it!' she muttered brokenly, as she passed him and went hastily up the stairs.

'Poor little girl!' he whispered huskily, his vision not quite clear as he looked after her. 'How she suffers! If there were only something that I might do to help her!'

CHAPTER XXIV.

BEBE KNOWS AT LAST.

THE Place de l'Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile is the center of two wide avenues which stretch out from it like the spokes of a wheel.

In one of them a dainty little residence was situated with a charming rose garden at the back, a place that attracted attention in the beautiful Paris, not because of its magnificence, but for the quiet yet tasteful elegance of its surroundings.

Not alone was the architecture, backed as it was by roses, attractive, but there was something about the drapery of the superb lace at the windows that caught the eyes of woman and held them.

'A successful artist lives there,' they told themselves and each other as they drove by in their handsome equipages. 'Who is he?'

But no one was able to answer the question.

For some time the neighbors saw no sign of life about the place save an occasional servant, and at a certain hour each day the carriages of a physician drove up. Then his visits grew less frequent and finally ceased.

It was not long afterward until their patient watching was rewarded by seeing a pale, but exceedingly lovely girl emerge from the house upon the arm of a handsome curious man, who seemed to guard her footsteps as she would have done those of a tottering child.

He followed her into a carriage; then, without haste, they were driven away, while the neighbors made strenuous efforts to discover their identity.

'Pierre,' exclaimed Etienne Millet, to his valet, without glancing up from the drawing he was making for Figaro, 'have you discovered who the "people across the way" are?'

'Yes, monsieur. They are Americans. Their names are Loyd-Mostyn.'

'But who is the young lady who has been ill? The one who is so much in the garden?'

'She is Monsieur Loyd-Mostyn's wife.'

'His wife! That child! You must be mistaken!'

Etienne Millet was not looking at his drawing now, but at his valet, a curious light in his handsome, dark eyes.

'No, monsieur,' returned the servant, firmly but respectfully. 'Philippe, Madam Loyd-Mostyn's maid, told me all about it. Madam is very unfortunate. She is not only blind but insane.'

'What?'

'It is quite true, monsieur. Madam has been blind since she was an infant, I believe, and lost her mind some months after her marriage. She fancies her husband is her father, and continually speaks to him as "papa," after the American fashion. He is very devoted, Philippe tells me, and now that she has recovered from her illness he will summon the best medical aid in France to restore her mind, if possible.'

Etienne Millet turned away. There seemed to be no questions further he wished to ask, but in dreamy silence he turned his great eyes in the direction of the rose gardens.

For some time he remained so; then, with a compression of his finely chiseled lips that meant determination, he turned to his drawing.

But at last in disgust, he threw down his pencil and sprang from his chair.

'Order my trap at once,' he exclaimed.

claimed. "I am going out."

Paris at this time was in a most deplorable condition for the first time since the beginning of the siege had already begun with the occupation by the Germans of the heights on the left side of the river, and the capture of the unfinished remnant of Châtillon.

The French guards were warlike in spirit, but it seemed not for the purpose of repulsing the Prussians so much as of exciting disorder, a purpose which they were accomplishing only too well.

Lloyd Mostyn, however, had thought little of the condition of Paris when he took up his abode here. It seemed to him that the besieged city offered the safest retreat, and he remained there, caring nothing for the city so long as he succeeded in his undertaking. In the drives which he had taken for the benefit of his own health, he had been careful to avoid the Bois de Boulogne and Champs Elysees, the haunts of Americans, choosing instead the Boulevard du Palais in the City, crossing by the Pont Neuf.

It was in that direction that he gave his order to the driver on the morning that Bebe accompanied him for the first time, and as they drove slowly he told her of the places they were passing, of the romantic histories connected with each, and she listened with a pleased smile.

He told her amusing stories and pathetic ones, until at last he saw a slight frown gathering between her dainty brows.

"Are you tired, darling?" he asked, with great gentleness, leaning toward her and taking her hand.

"Not at all," she answered.

"Then what is it?"

"How is it that you know so much of Paris when you were never here before? Oh, papa, there is so much that puzzles me that sometimes my brain seems on fire!"

"You must not allow such things to distress you, Bebe," he returned tenderly. "Explanations are so simple—even when things seem most extraordinary. I have read what I have told you."

"Oh!"

"Why is it that you do not trust me, Bebe?"

"I do! Indeed I do! You think that I do not because—because—I cannot tell you why! There is something gone! It makes my head ache so when I try to think it all out. I wish you would help me! When I was a little girl you used always to take me upon your knee and kiss me while you explained things that were hard. But you don't any more. Why don't you?"

The blind eyes were fixed upon him wistfully, but they could not see the pained color that flashed into his face.

"Would you love, me better if I did?" he asked, his tone low and filled with embarrassment.

A slight shudder passed over her, and she leaned further back among the cushions of the carriage.

"No!" she answered quickly, almost hysterically. "I should hate you, I think. You are very good to me, but everything is changed. Everything! I was so happy then; but now—now I am so miserable that I wish I could die!"

"There! I have pained you again. The agony in your voice was almost a stab. I am always wounding you of late, but I don't intend to. I don't seem able to help it. Poor papa! Will you forgive me?"

"You know that I would forgive you anything. But tell me, Bebe, when is it all to end? When are you to be my own little girl?"

His eyes were filled with a dog-like devotion, his lips trembled, yet there was a suppressed yearning underlying it.

She heard it, and the tiny hands were clasped in the girl's lap with a peculiar force, while the face grew a shade paler.

"Sometimes you—frighten me!" she whispered. "It is that, I think, which makes me feel that life is changed. It is that which weighs upon my mind and heart. I want you until you come, and then my soul rebels. You are so good to me, and yet the touch of your hand is torture. I am wrong to say this to you—Oh, papa, what is it? Tell me, if you can, I am so miserable, I know that I am making you unhappy, but I can't help it, indeed, I can't!"

There was a wild sob in the voice. Loyd-Mostyn's face blanched while he leaned toward her to comfort her.
