HARVEST TIME.

The lengthening shadows, leaving the green law,
Creep down the rugged rocks and stoop to kiss the sea.

Wrapped in a peaceful stillness Nature lies,
As if, while gazing on the quiet skies,
She had looked past their depths, and met God's eyes.

Half-veiled in golden light of shimmering air,
The landscape stretches, wondrously fair,
No trace of falling beauty anywhere.

The silver river, winding through the leas,
The singing birds on every greenwood tree,
The music of the never silent sea,

Like little lambskins hastening to the fold,
And seeking shelter from the wind and cold,
Drift the white cloudlets to the gates of gold,

Into its rainbow-veiled setting-place
The golden orb rises down the silent grace,
Selling in the clouds its radiant face.

Longer the shadows stretch beyond the trees,
From my sight fades the harvest plain and sea,
And twilight clasps its pale arms lovingly

The Braes of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

Amongst the most persistent of the pursuers—if not the most persistent—was Adam Scott of Tushielaw.

During this time the Royal party were still at Kelso Abbey following the chase almost daily, and partaking of what other entertainment the good Abbot Thomas—who had been released from the thralldom of Lord Home could devise to please his guests.

Wherever the Queen was, the East of Angus was sure to be near; and there were not a few murmurs of discontent at the supposed influence he exercised over her Majesty.

Affairs generally were in this unsatisfactory position when the fatal year 1518 died, and its successor came to add its number to the span of man's life.

There was feasting and mirth in the Abbey Hall. The Royal party was about to return to Holyrood, and good Father Thomas desired to impress her Majesty and the young King with a pleasant memory of Kelso.

The banquet began about dusk and rarely ended before midnight, for although the Queen and her ladies retired from the board in decorous time, many of her lords and squires sat long wine bibbing.

The doer opened quietly, and a man dressed in dark garments, stepped out upon the frosty lawn.
