The Bank of England has already arranged for the return, in the middle of next month, of the £3.00,000 borrowed of the Bank of France, and yet money remains at 1 per cent, in London for bankers' balances. So far as can now be foreseen, there is little reason to doubt that money will continue very abundant there, and that the demand for investments will insulate the demand for investments will be a subject to the demand of the dema and that the demand for investments will increase.

In the United States, says the New York Post, the strain to provide money to pay the increased duties on the large increase of imports is over, speculation in commodities, especially in grain, has run its course and the absorption of money in those directions will diminish. On the lat of next September nearly $58,500,000 of the $4$ per cent. United States bonds will mature and that will bring out of the Treasury all the surplus that may have accumulated and make an additional demand for other investment for the capital. So that altogether there is a prospect of lower rates of interest in 1891 than for several years past.
