[Canadian Press.] London, Sept. 25 .- A correspondent of the Daily News, telegraphing Tuesday from outside of Paris, says: "The battle now proceeding is, of course, beyond description. No one man can see it. It would take a good walker, for instance, at least a fortnight to get from one end of the line to the other. You still come across croakers who are convinced that the Germans are playing a subtle game, that they have something up their sleeve, and will presently give an alarming surprise, which they now are carefully developing behind their lines, and

There is nothing more mysterious in their plans than that, and the allies cannot make quicker progress, because the Germans are very many, are well armed, have strong positions, and know that if they break now, they break for good. Their prolonged and formidable resistance is no more mysterious than their retreat. Luck is almost as important in warfare as good soldiers. Admitting the value of that essential, it is safe to say the Germans will never get back to Paris. They will see Berlin
