The Great Fight Between Gladstone and Beaconsfield.

William Ewart Gladstone came on hour apparently in the history of England, though a right one for mankind. was still in the air, and through it loomed Napoleon. With commerce paralyzed at its centers, war impending, and agitation among the people, many men of property in England, merchants and others heretofore untinged with Toryism, suddenly got a strong Conservative bias. No wonder, then, that the son of a great merchant, himself somewhat of a politician-in fact, Sir John Gladstone sat in the House of Commons beside his son later-should have imbibed Toryism at the start, though his GLADSTONE VS. HIS FREE TRADE CONVERSION. It was during the next decade, made memorable by the anti-corn law agitation, that Gladstone became converted to free trade, of which he has ever since been a candid, though somewhat incautious champion. Gladstone's acceptance of free trade, during this period, marked an era in his political life practically; for it led to his re-tirement from Newark, as his patron, Newcastle, was an ardent protectionist. So when Gladstone returned to parliament, it was as a representative of his college-the University of Oxford. No summary of Gladstone's life would be complete without a reference to the Naples episode. While spending several months, in the winter of 1850 and 1851, in that beautiful city, he learned that many citizens who had formed the opposition in the Chamber of Deputies had become obthe world-stage, Dec. 29, 1809-a dark jects of King Ferdinand's wrath, and that some 20,000 had been thrown into prison on political charges. After testing the accuracy of these reports, The smoke of the French revolution and finding them substantially true, Gladstone published a denunciation of the Neapolitan Government, in the form of two open letters to the Earl of Aberdeen. One of the reasons, however, which he gave for his chivalrous course in endeavoring to miprisons by challenging the attention of Europe, is curious evidence how hard it is for a man who has pince been a Tory to outgrow the Tory point of view. "Secondly," he says, these practices are certainly and even rapidly doing the work of republicanism in that country." Dreadful probability defeat in English reform, Gladstone struck the first blow in the great struggle for the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Never, perhaps, in valrous course in endeavoring to militigate the horrors of the Neapolitan cal and argumentative powers been put forth so grandly as in this campaign. But Disraeli's remark on the new system the ministry had adopted of vindicating their characters during this recess was only too true: "We really have had no time to forget anything. Her majesty's ministers may be said, during the last six months, to have lived in a blaze of apology." The Gladstone Ministry was palpably on the defensive, and there were signs during the year 1871 that its popuarity was waning. A reaction had set in early. In that year a section of Gladstone's constituents petitioned him to resign his seat for Grenwich. It was indeed an eventful year; war still raging between France and Prussia, though a treaty of Peace was signed in May; difficulties with the United States over the Alabama claims being adjusted; the disestablishment of the Irish Church completed on Jan. 1; agitation for the abolition of the House of Lords, or for their reform, Gladstone defending the Lords; and Sir Charles Dilke announcing himself a Republican, and in favor of that form of government, up a whirlgig that was soon to bring its revenges. THE GOVERNMENT'S DEFEAT. In the year 1872 Mr. Gladstone's Irish university bill was rejected. After this defeat, of course, Gladstone resigned office, whereupon a difficulty arose. He was really anxious to be relieved of his duties, but Disraeli declined to accept office with a majority of the house against him, and some days later Gladstone stated that he and his colleagues had consented to resume their positions. Two great acts of Mr. Gladstone at this time were the abolition of purchase in the army and the adoption of the ballot bill. In 1874 his ministry was defeated; and Mr. Gladstone not only retired from office, but resigned the leadership of his party, which was intrusted to the Marquis of Hartington. But, though occupying a subordinate position in name, he was still recognized as the actual Liberal leader in Great Britain; and when his party returned to power after the general election of 1880, the voice of the people pronounced emphatically that to no other should be intrusted the chief place in the Liberal ministry. Mr. Gladstone continued premier until 1885, when a defeat in a division, caused his resignation, Lord Salisbury taking the reins. The general election soon followed, and it was found that the Irish party held the balance of power. A junction of the Liberal and Irish forces overthrew the Salisbury Government, and Mr. Gladstone became premier for the third time. In the same year Mr. Gladstone espoused home rule, and was defeated in the house. He immediately resigned, and appealed to the country.
