Old Oil Driller in Far Sumatra

Writes of His Travels and Experiences in Strange Lands.

Life Among the Naked Malays Where the Rains Remind One of the Deluge and Rivers Run Everywhere-Wonderful Land for Oil Wells.

Jieve Fink, a well-known personage in oil circles, is now in Sumatra, Dutch Letters from him, under dates of Dec. 12 and 18, 1897, have been re-seived by a friends in Pittsburg, Pa. Mr. Fink writes that he went first to London, where he spent ten days sight-beeing. He says: "I sailed from London on Sept. 2, and the trip through the Mediterranean Sea to Port Said, Egypt, was delightful. The trip through the Red Sea, a body of water which is comparatively narrow, and is hemmed in by sandy deserts in Africa and Arabia, was simply frightful. The hot blasts of air from these deserts burned the skin off my hands, face, arms and feet so that I could not move for two days. A watch was set on the stokers, fearing that they would become crazed and jump overboard, something the captain admitted had happened on his ship more than once."

THE PEOPLE OF SINGAPORE. He says that the weather was rough while on the Indian Ocean. The ship landed at Singapore on Oct. 8, where he remained sixteen days. Another extract reads: "This city (Singapore) of 175,000 people is made up of Chinese, Malays, Japanese, Javanese, Hindus and a number of other tribes of darkskinned people. About half of the people wear nothing but a breech-clout and a skull cap, and most of the children to 6 and 7 years, go about in the clothes they were born in. There are many Chinese and Hindu temples, museums, botanical gardens, zoos, and many ancient buildings of interest here. I visited the palace of the Sultan of Johore, at Johore, at the end of the island. We drove fourteen miles to that place over roads as smooth and level as a floor, over which palm and "I shall not attempt to describe this palace, further than saying that there is not a carpet or a window in it. Many of the rooms are so large and so full of rugs, mats and skins, that a cat could hide from one for an indefinite time. Instead of windows the outside walls are made like outer shutters, with slats that turn up and down.

"One day, as I was walking in the suburbs of Singapore, I saw a native ddling about and offering for sale at $10 each three young tigers within a bamboo cage. He took them out one the head to show that they would not

A TREE DWELLING.

"Not far from here, in a small field or common, I saw a tree, whose branches had drooped and taken root in the ground; and in perhaps the last 500 years this arbor had covered nearly a half acre of ground. Between the undreds of trunks were partitions of palm matting, and within lived upward of twenty Chinese families, and each family with half that many

"I also saw an old Hindu juggler, long white hair and beard, and such a face as we fancy Moses and lomon had. He was squatted beside the road and with a hundred or more people gathered close around him. He raked together a little mound of earth and performed the famous mango

Mr. Fink traveled further and landed in Palembang on Oct. 26. Palembang, he says, is a city of 75,000 Chinese, Malays, etc., and is the metropolis and capital of Sumatra. 'The town is on the Moese river." he writes, "fifty miles inland, and is built along both banks of the river for eight or ten miles. As many of the houses as there is room for are built over the water along the banks. On one side of the river the houses stand on posts six or eight feet high, and on the other side they are built upon rafts or cribs of bamboo poles. These last rise and fall with the tide. The tide comes within a foot of the floors of the stationary hourses.

HIS OWN CHAMBERMAID. 'At the principal hotel, where I stop, I used to dip enough water through the window to last me until the tide returned. Chambermaids there are none, forcing me to make my own bed, and to care for the room. Running back from the river are hundreds of narrew, deep canals, formed by time and tide. From each house is a pair of steps or a ladder reaching to the bottom of these. This is the native bathroom and laundry. One-third of the people live in small covered boats. These boats go up and down the river, carrying fruits and vegetables, which they bring to town to dispose of. "Every morning and evening the canals are alive with men, women and children bathing. The women wear a single garment, a straight skirt, which is wound around the body and reaches to the knees. The natives live almost entirely upon rice and dried fish, which, when warmed, give forth a most nauseating odor.

"No marriages here are the result of courtship and love, but are invariably brought about by the groom paying in advance from $40 to $75 to the bride's father. After a native is married his working days are practically ended, as the women do most of the work.

THE SUMATRAN'S PARADISE. "They are seen in the fields grubbing and planting, while the 'gentleman' of the family is at home smoking wretched tobacco rolled in dried palm leaves. The lazy fellows do not even mind the baby, for it is usually seen on the mother's back. The children are carried astride, held on by a sash or a rag passed over one shoulder and under the other arm, and tied in front. the afternoon the sash is shifted to the other shoulder.

The natives, as a rule, are not large, strong or muscular, but they possess some courage. They look upon the white man as a prince, and fear him,

They secure the tigers in traps built of logs and kill them with long spears (they are forbidden firearms). "In this country you would wonder at the number of rivers; but then, after seeing a tropical rain, you would wonder how even so many rivers could carry away the water which falls. The rainy season is now on. It rains every day, usually at night and rarely before 4 p.m. Every day is as hot as any one that you ever had in the United States, but I have become thoroughly acclimated and do not mind it much now. "The children and young girls in the villages scatter and run like a lot of partridges when a white man approaches, but when his face becomes familiar they become bold enough to stand about twenty feet distant and examine his ring, chain and his ap-

Mr. Fink has gone east to interest himself in oil drilling. He met several Americans there on the same errand. Pipe lines and oil tanks are to be built and refineries established.

He remarks a well of 1,000 barrels a day, which is situated not far from his lease. The oil, he says, is inferior to the American product. The oil comes sometimes from a depth of only 250 feet, and none from lower than 750

On this occasion, amidst chance directed. The pastors of the early Christian church, who by every possible means endeavored to eradicate the vestiges of pagan superstitions, substituted in the present instance the names of particular saints instead of those of the women, and as the festival of Lupercalia had commenced about the middle of February, they appear street railwaymen working 18 hours to have chosen St. Valentine's Day for celebrating the new feast, because it occurred at nearly the same time. It was composed mostly of "puddlers," who worked at the puddling furnaces in the Bay View rolling mills. Last July the puddling furnaces at the Bay View rolling mills were closed permanently, and as there are no prospects of employment for the puddlers, it was decided to disband the union. The department stores of Denver re-

The allied printing trades and central labor union indorsed the stand taken by the newspapers, and public sympathy was aroused to such an extent that a general boycott of department stores was imminent. This was more than the instigators of the movement had bargained for, and they were forced to capitulate.

Here is Piper Findlater writing to his folks: "It was me that played the pipes when I got shot, and it was a wonder I got away with my life, for I was sitting right in the open, and the bullets were glancing round me in all directions. If it is in the papers that my leg was taken off, it is not true." Piper Milne, the other hero, has written to a brother in Vancouver a letter, in which the sentence occurs: "Off we went, playing 'The Cock o' the North,' through a perfect storm of bullets." This would show that the Gordons entered upon their forlorn hope to that tune, and that "The Haughs of Cromdale" came later.
