CXI.—Confidences

When Alice, quite suffused, returned gentleman coming into the shop to-to the sitting-room, i determined to tell her of the forgery of the check. In no other way could the foolish girl man came in alone, and bought it. The In no other way could the foolish girl be placed upon her guard.

I knew, of course, that Alice would not keep the secret. She would probably go straight to Tony and tell him all about it. I might be hailed into the courts for libel.

But I did not care.

I recounted, then, to Alice, the trouble that had fallen on Jim through Tony.

Alice looked startled.

"Of course, come to think of it, your Jim does resemble Tony. And pray, what was the description of the lady like?"

"Yourself," I answered quickly.

the courts for libel.

But I did not care.
I recounted, then, to Alice, the trouble that had fallen on Jim through Tony—the forging of the check in Jim's father's name—my foolish quarrel with my husband—our parting—my amazement at finding Jim lying wounded by the readside.

What was the description of the lady like?"

"Yourself," I answered quickly.

"You seem to know all about the matter, Helene. How did you find out that it was I?"

"I visited the shop myself, and made investigations."
