Mr. Desaulniers further remarked: "If Christ had written an article, h would never have written what L'Action Sociale wrote against me." The plaintiff, in his action, claims that defendants published, on Aug. 2, 1913, an article in their paper from L'Univers of Paris, France, in which it was said, referring to a certain well-known person, he has amongst his "collaborators" men like Gon-salve. Such revival would be naturally due in April, always supposing English participation not to be prevented by home considerations. But the tendency at present is to feel that a really prolonged advance would be blocked by the pressure of new loans on the market and that no continuous and permanent recovery can be expected until such borrowing countries as Canada, the South American states and other British colonies make up their minds to curtail their public expenditures to reduce their requisitions on international capital.

Certainly within the last few days there has been a marked change in the attitude of the Liberal party towards the proposal to exclude temporarily the four Protestant counties from the operation of the act. It is felt that actual experience of the working of a real Irish Government will in all probability mollify the rigorous hostility, due mainly to appeals to racial and religious prejudice. Notwithstanding the better prospect of a home rule settlement the ex-tremer section of the Unionist party are as determined as ever to compel a dissolution thru the rejection or post-ponement of the Mutiny Act by the house of lords. This is the act which must be passed every year in order to provide for the army establishment. It is freely doubted whether the peers will be reckless enough to lend them-selves to a step designed either to compel the premier to ask for a disso-lution or to force the King to revive his prerogative in order to serve the purposes of the opposition.
