I see them fading round me, The beautiful, the bright, As the rose-red lights that darken At the falling of the night. I had a lute, whose music Made sweet the summer wind; But the broken strings have vanished, And no song remains behind.

I had a lonely garden, Fruit and flowers on every bough, But the frost came too severely, 'Tis decayed and blighted now.

That lute is like my spirits— They have lost their buoyant tone, Crushed and shattered, they've forgotten The glad notes once their own. And my mind is like that garden— It has spent its early store, And wearied and exhausted It has no strength for more.

I will look on them as warnings, Sent less in wrath than love, To call the being homeward— To its other home above.

As the Leshian in false worship, Hung her harp upon the shrine, When the world lost its attraction, So will I offer mine:— But in another spirit, With a higher hope and aim, And in a holier temple, And to a bolier name.

I offer up affections, Void, violent, and vain; I offer years of sorrow Of the mind, and body's pain. I offer up my memory—
'Tis a drear and darkened page,
Where experience has been bitter,
And whose youth has been like age.

I offer hopes, whose folly Only after thoughts can know, For, instead of seeking Heaven, They were chained to earth below.

Saying wrong and grief have brought me To thy altar as a home, I am sad and broken-hearted, And therefore am I come. Let the incense of my sorrow Be on high a sacrifice; The worn and contrite spirit, Thou alone wouldst not despise

Russian Empire.—In one of the foreign scientific journals there is a calculation, according to which the Russian Empire exceeds the terra firma of the Moon by 123,885 square leagues. The diameter of the moon is 803 leagues, consequently the surface is 2,505,261 square leagues. If in the moon, as in our earth, the fluid part, which we call sea, covers two-thirds of the surface, only 835.087 square niles remain for the terra firma. Now according to the calculations made in 1818, the Russian empire extends over a surface of 928,972 square leagues, the possessions in America included, consequently the express remains as above stated. According to another calculation, the Russian Empire extends over 170 degrees of longitude, and 26½ of latitude. It contains about 2-19th parts of terra firma, the 14th part of our femisphere, and the 28th part of our earth. Its population is about 45,271,469 souls; 1,000,000 of savages, and 340,000 noblemen not included.—Whittaker's Monthly Magazine. RUSSIAN EMPIRE. - In one of the foreign
