

"Among all those who will have spoken of me when you read this note, Douglas, there is but one man who will not have cursed me, but one who will think of me in days to come with any gentle feeling, and that is he whom I have injured the miost, whose very name I have covered with shame and dishonor. I do not ask him to forgive, Douglas. I know he will feel but pity for the erring, unhappy ather, who, ruined, dishonored, wretched as he is, thinks of him and loves him now—if that be possible—with yet more love than he has ever done before. I dare not look into the future for you, my son. I see in it nothing but sorrow, nothing but suffering for my sin. I was mad, surely, to risk all in such blindness; and, coward that I am, I leave you yet more sorrow in not daring to face the consequence of my sin. I see but one gleam of brightness in the future for you, and if the prayers of such as I are heard it will be given you. May the love and tenderness of the heart you have won still remain yours. That it will I hope, I believe, for she is true and steadfast, and she loves you; and when she is dearest to you, when her children and yours climb upon your knee in years to come, let the childish voices plead for me; and when you love them best you will pity me with yet greater pity, knowing how your father's heart bled for the wounds he caused his son to suffer, by the depth of your own love for her and them; and tell her that with my last breath I prayed—ed—even I pray. Douglas—for a blessing on her and you. One more charge I of your own love for her and them; and tell her that with my last breath I prayed—even I pray, Douglas—for a blessing on her and you. One more charge I leave you, Douglas; I need hardly name it here—the child, Kathleen. I can write no more; my hand fails."

The last few lines were almost illegible, so uneven and blotted was the writing, as all 6 was that on the envelope.

Douglas tolded up the letter, not quite, in the numbness of his great grief, understanding it all, but with the words "in not daring to face the consequences of my sin" cancing before his eyes in letter, of fire. What did they mean? Of what explanation did they admit? Could it be, great heaven; could it be that—No—no—no! It was impossible!

Staggering like a men intoxicated, Douglas left the room, clutching blindly at the empty air as if for support. He would assuredly have fallen had it not been for the assistance of the gentleman who was still writing on the landing, and who sprang forward and caught him in his strong arms.

For one moment of natural weakness,

I am Sir Frederic Palmer Philip Clement," replied the other. "He, Sir Frederic, is absent."
"It is very late," resumed Douglas, as they went slowly downstairs, the young doctor's kindly blue eyes looking full of doctor's kindly blue eyes looking full of pity as he glanced at his companion's anguish-stricken face—the face of the man he had seen at Sir Edward Marchmont's ball, and sometimes since then so full of happiness and love, riding or driving with Andree during his short intervals of leave. "It is very late, and I ought hardly to detain you any longer; but can you give me five minutes?"

"Fifty, if you like," was the instant answer. "But first, Captain Lancaster, I must insist on your taking some re-answer. "But first, Captain Lancaster, I must insist on your taking some refreshment."

A faint attempt at a smile crossed Captain Lancaster's lips, and when they entered the dining room together he allowed his companion to pour out some wine, which he drank with a kind of nervous eagerness, as though he would gain strength. Then he sat down at the table, and, shading his face with one hand, remained silent for a moment.

"You were with my father when he ted, Dr. Clement?" he said, half interrotatively, half affirmatively.

"I was not," he answered. "Unfortuately I arrived too late, although I came with all possible speed when summoned. Mr. Lancaster's death was almost a sudgen one." den one."
And over the young man's ruddy, open countenance passed a slight expression of anxiety; it seemed as if he feared the next question.

"But you can tell me," resumed Douglas, still with his face shaded, "surely you can tell me the cause," and his voice quivered with eagerness as he spoke.

Philip Clement's anxious expression deepened. 'I have not been Mr. Lancaster's medi- large.

cal adviser," he said, in a troubled voice.
"I can surmise, of course, but I can say nothing definite." nothing definite."

"And what do you surmise?" And Douglas removed his hand from his face and looked up with eager, searching eyes so full of an unspoken but terrible doubt that the other could not meet them.

"I think it is possible—I mean probable—that Mr. Lancaster's death proceeded from heart disease. You can tell me, perhaps whether he suffered from—"

"I have never heard so," said Douglas, his heart beating with such force as to make speech difficult.

"You see, he has undergone much anxiety and trouble lately. I believe Sir Frederic has been attending him for some little time past," and again Dr. Clement hesitated, fidgeting nervously with an ornament on the mantel-piece on which he leaned.

There was a pause; Douglas still kept on which he leaned.

There was a pause; Douglas still kept his eyes fixed upon his companion, who still studiously avoided his glance.

"Doctor," said Captain Lancaster, at length, "will you answer me with all truth and sincerity if I ask you one question?"

"Certainly," fidgeted Dr. Clement. "Can you doubt it?"

"It will be mistaken kindness not to do so," the other went on. "I can bear

"Tertainty, higgeted Dr. Clement. Can you doubt it?"

"It will be mistaken kindness not to do so," the other went on. "I can bear anything better than this uncertainty. Have you any suspicion—has the idea crossed your mind that—that—that my father destroyed himself?"

The young man hesitated, but finding words difficult to find, he bowed his head silently, and turned away, unable to meet Captain Lancaster's glance.

For some minutes there was a silence in the room; no sound disturbed the profound stillness save the ticking of the timepiece on the mantel-piece, the hands of which pointed to eleven o'clock, and the unhappy son's hurried breathing as he sat by the table, his head bowed upon his crossed arms. Dr. Clement spoke at length, having cleared his throat once or twice before he could do so.

"Captain Lancaster," he said, gently, "you must remember that I have really nothing to go by, and that my own doubts go for nothing. I may be mistaken; recollect that I am by no means sure, have no real grounds for the supposition, that it is only an idea in connection with the last sorrowful events." Still the same silence from Douglas. "I am anxiously expecting Sir Frederic; he is coming down tonight by the mail, and will be here in the morning. I hope he will be able to set your mind at rest on that point. I hope, I believe, that I am mistaken."

The honest young doctor was not very clear in his consolations, but his tone was one of exceeding friendliness and sym-

The honest young doctor was not very clear in his consolations, but his tone was one of exceeding friendliness and sympathy, which was pleasant to Douglas in his great strait.

"I need hardly say,' he went on, "that my suspicions have not passed my lips, and will never do so, Captain Lancaster, to any other but yourself."

Douglas stretched out his hand and the other gave it a cordial grasp; from that moment Douglas Lancaster and Philip Clement were friends.

Then, with a sudden impulse, the desire to unbosom himself which is so strong sometimes, the former turned and spoke:

spoke:
"I will confide in you, Dr. Clement," he said. "I am sure my doubt is justined. I found this in my father's room," he went on, reopening the letter which had given him so much pain, and point he went on, reopening the letter which had given him so much pain, and pointing to the passage relating to the cowardice which prevented him from bearing the consequences of his fraud.

Philip Clement read it attentively, and his face fell. Looking at the words from an impartial point of view, they only confirmed the suspicions he had been so loth to entertain, and Douglas, reading the confirmation of his fears in the sad face of the young doctor, turned away with a heavy sigh.

No-no-no! It was impossible!

Staggering like a men intoxicated, Douglas left the room, clutching blindly at the empty air as if for support. He would assuredly have fallen had it not been for the assistance of the gentleman who was still writing on the landing, and who sprang forward and caught him in his strong arms.

For one moment of natural weakness, the consequence of this terrible trouble, combined with long fasting and traveling, Captain Lancaster's head sank on the friendly shoulder which supported him; then he raised it, pale and calm.

"Thank you," he said quietly, but in a husky voice. "Did I understand you to say that you belonged to the medical profession?"

"I am Sir Frederic Palmer's assistant.

"The little formation of the reason face of the young doctor, turned away face of the young doctor, turned away with a heavy sigh.

At this moment the door of the room where they were was opened, and a young girl entered, hesitating for a moment on the threshold as if uncertain to advance when she perceived the stranger. Absorbed in his own grief, Douglas had not perceived her noiseless entrance; but Clement, glancing up, saw the slender form robed in a long white wrapper, the face beautiful as a poet's dream, white and wan as it was now; the golden hair hanging over her shoulders, the little hands extended toward Douglas.

Dr. Clement touched him gently on the shoulder and drew his attention to the poor child. Douglas gave him one glance of caution and entreaty, to which he prother of caution and entreaty of caution and entreaty, to which he answered by a nod; then the brother sprang forward and took his sister in his arms, and Dr. Clement went quietly out and left them together.

"This is very dreadful for you, my poor Kathie," he said, after a long pause, bending to press a kiss on her white brow as she lay sobbing and trembling in his arms. "I wish I could have been with you sooner."

"Oh, Douglas! Papa—dear, dear papa!"

"Kathie," he cried, lifting up his hand with a gesture of acute pain, "try to be brave, darling! Tell me, if you can, all about his last words—his last moments."

GIRL ELOPED WITH MARRIED

Guelph, Ont., July 8 .- Belwood village is in great excitement over the elopement of a well-known married man with a girl of 19, and the subsequent charge of horse stealing laid against him, his arrest in Midland, and escape from jail after appearing before the magistrate. The man is Thomas Richardson, about 35 years old, who has a wife and three children. Richardson and the girl lived together at Midland for a week, then they quarreled, and the girl ran away going to her uncle's house in Fergus for refuge. Here she told her story, and Richardson was arrested for stealing the horse he hired at Belwood. He escaped from the Midland lockup, but the owner of the horse recovered his property. Richardson is still at

INTERNATIONAL MATCH. The Canadian Cricket Association has decided to hold the match with the United States cricketers in September, sometime after the 12th, on he Rosedale grounds in Toronto. THE CANADIANS IN NEW YORK. New York, July 9.-The Canadian cricket players began a two days' match against a team representing the Metropolitan League at the grounds of Metropolitan League at the stodies of the Knickerbocker A. C., at Bayonne, N. J., yesterday. The Metropolitan players won the toss, and Tyers, the K. A. C. professional, and K. G. Bancroft were sent in to bat against the bowling of R. H. Rooke and H. B. McGiverin. The wicket looked to be in favor of the bowlers in consequence of the heavy rain of the night before. Light showers fell during the forenoon, which did not improve it any. Tyers cut the first ball bowled by Rooke for a single, and the next ball from the same bowler took Bancroft's wicket Score, 1 run for 1 wicket. E. H. Smith then joined Tyers, and each made a hit for four, with another single from Tyers. At 1:40 play was adjourned for lunch. Score, 20 runs, with 1 wicket

Four Special Cars Being Built To Be Used by the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall.

The Ottawa Car Company is building four special cars, which will be used in Quebec by the Duke and Duchess of Cornwall and York during their stay in the ancient capital. The cars will be open and plate glass and bronze will be freely used in them. Work on the construction of a part of the first section of the Parry Sound-Sudbury Railway commenced Monday, at the junction with the Canada Atlantic Railway, four miles from Parry Sound. The line is to be complete into Parry Sound by the fall, and it is expected that it will be pressed on as far as French River next year Messrs. Johnson and Bederige, Parry Sound, are the contractors for the section now under construction. Toronto will get 10 per cent of the street railway earnings from now till September, the end of the company's year, under the provision of the agreement providing that when the earnings go over $1,000,000, 10 per cent shall be paid on the excess.
