All this Richard Halstead knew, and long ago he had begun to realize that he had made an irreparable mistake, and to regretfully wish that he had left all regretfully wish that he had left all match-making alone.

And now, as he stood and talked with the woman whom his son had loved, marked her exceeding loveliness, the glow and energy of perfect health about her, the charm and graciousness of her manner, he groaned within himself over his meddlesome folly, and almost regretted that his tongue and hand had not been paralyzed before he had uttered those arbitrary commands to his son, or writtenthat heartless, deceitful letter to Dudley Waldemar. Waldemar.
As for Audrey, her thoughts were busy also. She was wondering if Arthur was prospering; was he happy? did the wife who had been forced upon him prove a suitable helpmate and companion? was his home a pleasant place, and did sweet children gather around his heart, and watch his coming and going?

All this she would have been glad to know-she lenged to ask. But no trace of it was visible in her face. no sign of appeared in her calm manner. The looked into Richard Halstead's face frankly and kindly; she talked with him pleasantly and kindly; she talked with him pleasantly and graciously, for she had forgiven him, long ago, for his share in her unhappiness; as long ago as when she had "lain down her arms," and prayed to be patient, and to be forgiven for her wild rebellion against her hard fate. A little later, however, when they had separated, and Rich and Aunie had strelled out into the groundache had regretting, all too late, the sorrow and wrong to which selfishness and an Iron will had doomed two loving hearts—two promising lives. CHAPTER XXVII.

The next day was the Sabbath, and a erfect day it was. After dinner Rich and his companions went out for a quiet stroll along the beach; but there were many people who had no respect for the acredness of the day, and the gay tughter and the merry jests which pass-

Audrey's ear.

"Let us get out of this thoroughfare and climb that hill yonder," she said to Rich, and painting to an abrupt rise of ground at some distance, they at once turned their steps in that direction.

They reached the hill only became the ascent, but it was steeper than they had believe if we should go to the top

"You and tunie go on if you like," she returned, "a d I will sit under yonder tree until you come back. I do not believe I feel equal to such a climb, although the path seems quite good, and as if it was a favorite resort."

So the young lovers, nothing loath, waved her a smiling adieu, and kept on up the steep path, while she turned aside to the snot which she had indicated. to the spot which she had indicated.
"Dear children," she murmured, looking after them, "how hopefully and fearlessly they climb the difficult way!

hope their life-journey may have no road so rough. Still, whatever it may be, so long as they love one another, they can e happy and content."
The spot where she had told them she would wait was just a little aside from the beaten path, shaded by a great tree and a luxuriant group of dwarf ever-greens, while just behind these there was a huge boulder, which evidently had often served as a resting-place for some weary climber

Audrey sat down upon it, drew her that shawl about her, folded her hands ly in her lap, and gazed off upon the Behind her were the evergreens and the great trunk of the tree: beyond the beaten track and the hill, and before her the vast, beautiful expanse of water.

"How beatuiful it is!" Audrey murmurged. "Who, looking upon it now, would belive it could ever be lashed to fury by an angry storm? The very sight of it

And who, looking upon her in her calmbeauty, would have believed that her soul had ever been tossed, and rent, and torn by angry, rebellious inward tempests, which had threatened to wreck both life and season?

She fell into a reverie, and the time slipped unheeded by. She could not have told how long she sat there, but she suddenly became conscious of approaching footsteps and the sound of voices.

She glanced back, thinking Rich and Annie might be returning; but she saw, instead, the figures of two gentlemen
coming toward her, and, supposing them to be no one whom she knew, she turned,
her gaze again upon the sea.
But the two figures halted directly under the tree, although they could not see

But she heard a voice say:
"No, I must go back on the nine o'clock boat—I merely run down to tell you that we are not going to stay, so that you may not retain the rooms for us." Something about those tones made Audrey Waldemar catch her breath and grow as white as the delicate lace hand-kerchief which she had tied about her throat, to protect it from the dampness. They were tones which she had not heard for more than twenty years, but she knew them instantly—she would have known them had she heard them in the remotest corner of the earth.

known them had she heard them in the remotest corner of the earth.

She knew, even though she could not see him, that Arthur Halstead stood almost in her presence.

She felt very uncomfortable to sit there and listen to a conversation that was not intended for her ears; but she had no streangth to move, even if she could have brought herself to face the man whom she had never cessed to love strolled out into the grounds, she stole away to her room, where she relieved her burdened heart in a fit of quiet weeping—a little shower to bedew the grave where her dead hopes were resting.

Then she recovered her usual calm, and was her own sweet self once more, and after a time she descended to the parlors and mingled with the company, all unconscious that from a distant corner a pair of sad grav eyes were wistfully watching her, and a remorseful heart was regretting, all too late, the sorrow and white.

"Arthur, my boy, it has been a hard life for you, and I am sorry," said Mr. Halstead, in a voice of self-reproach almost humility.
"It is rather late in the day to talk about that," was the somewhat bitter about that," was the somewhat bitter retort.

"You have never forgiven me, have you, Art? I think you are a little hard upon your father," and the old man's voice was sharp with pain.

"Father" and Audrey almost cried out in sympathy. "Why will you refer to the past? Why speak of anything to remind me of it? I obeyed your behest—I have tried to do my duty since; it has not brought you the satisfaction we should have a grand view of both sea and land. Shall we try it, Aunt Audrey?"

Rich asked, as they stopped to rest for a moment.

"You and a mnie go on if you like," she returned "and I will sit under worder to be under the brought you the satisfaction that you expected, let the matter rest—regrets are worse than useless now."

"But, Arthur, I am getting to be an old man—I shall soon be done with life, and I would be an old man—I shall soon be done with life, and I would be an old man with the satisfaction." tremulous with emotion.

There was a moment of silence, then there came the constrained reply.

"Indeed, I have tried to show you all ne respect due from a son to his "Yes, you have—you have 'tried,' Arthur," was the sad response; it has not been a spontaneous offering—your manner and attention to me have been prompted by a sense of duty alone. Oh, my son, I have been only too conscious that I forfeited your affection more than twenty years ago, and it has been a source of great sorrow to me. Forgive a source of great sorrow to me. Forgive a source of great sorrow to me. Forgive me, Arthur—I have longed to say this to you for years, but could not bend my proud will to it. I see now"—and his son wondered at the stress laid upon that word—"I realize now that I did you a great wrong. I know that it must have been very hard all these years to have your life so cramped and warned as it.

IMPRESSED WITH SYSTEM

Toronto Junction Deputation at

Asylum Sewage Form.

At the regular monthly meeting of the Toronto Junction Town Council on Monday night, Councilor Bair read a report from the deputation which visited the Provincial Asylum at London to examine the sewage disposal system here. The report was a very favorable one. There is no perceptible odor from the system, says the report, and it is inexpensive, and is working well. Toronto Junction is more favorably situated than the London Asylum, because in Toronto Junction there is a natural fall in the drainage, whereas in London the sewage has to be pumped up to the sewage farm.

Macedonian Agitation Spreading. London, Oct. 7.—The Macedonian agitation is rapidly developing into a serious and general revolt. The Russian Government has instructed its ambassador at Constantinople to call the at-tention of the Porte to the serious condition of affairs in the Balkans, and to request that immediate and adequate steps be taken to restore der. It is, however, believed in diplomatic circles here that Turkey is unable to quell the insurrection, and it is feared that Russia's interference may lead to unpleasant complications.

Voluntary School Property.

London, Oct. 7.—The value of the school property of the English Church has been roughly estimated at $100,000,-000. Officials connected with the voluntary schools organization, whom I have consulted, place a much higher valuation upon it. They assert that the buildings and other plant of the voluntary schools could not be replaced at an expenditure of less than $2. Unless this be a gross over-valuation it disposes of the question of compensation which a good many controversialists have raised. No scheme of purchase will be practicable, and the most probable result is a compromise on the question of the control of the denominational schools, with toleration for every authorized catechism called for by the parents.

Girl Sleeping for Eight Days. Centralia, Ill., Oct. 6.—Miss Dora Meek, aged 17, a waitress, lay down at 3 o'clock Sunday afternoon, Sept. 28, to take a nap, and she is stin sleeping. She has never been aroused sumclent ly to swallow more than two tablespoonfuls of water or soup at a time. She has not even been partially aroused more than once a day, and each time before the third spoonful would be given her she would lapse into sound sleep. Several physicians have examined her and vainly attempted to arouse her. Yesterday ice was rubbed on her spine, but it had no effect. Physicians ascribe her condition to teria and nervous prostration. Today she was moved several squares in an open wagon without being aroused.

Surgeons From Ends of Earth Coming to America.

Chicago, Oct. 7 .- Five-year-old Lolita Armour, since her birth so badly crippled that she has never taken a step, is soon to receive treatment from two of the best-known surgeons in the world. The disarticulated hip joints, which have defied all the efforts of science, have been the cause of almost unendurable grief to her millionaire father, J. Ogden Armour, and to Mrs. Armour, who now have sent across the Atlantic for the best specialists that money can employ.
Dispatches from Vienna last night
