The Man Who Introduced Beethoven Into England

Lefcester has little to boast of so far abbe he was sent to study music under as music is concerned, but it can proudly claim as one of its citizens the man who was the first to introduce the works of Beethoven into England. This was William Gardiner, the son of a Leicester hosier. The latter was a keen musician, and the son places on record the fact that his father played the violioncello at the Little and Norman Grant, 2 Gordon age of 94. William Gardiner was born on March 15, 1770—singularly enough the the quiet Leicestershire lanes hungeryear of Beethoven's birth-and from childhood manifested a passionate love for music. A SIEGE PERILOUS

Dr. Woodrow Wilson may have stepped into Mr. Taft's shoes, says the Westminster Gazette, but he finds him-self physically incapable of filling his chair. When he settled down to work at the President's desk at the White House, he made an attempt to balance himself in the swivel chair which had supported the 300 pounds of his predecessor. After sliding about in it for a few minutes, he inquired whether something could not be found "with less breadth of beam." A search through the furniture of an adjoining room produced the chair used by Mr. Roosevelt, and in this the new President found himself more comfortable.
