

WITHOUT A HOME.

CHAPTER XXXV I.—Continued. "Nonsense," replied the young fellow in sudden confusion. "Any man who has learned to hunt well gets a quick eye."

"Oh yes, you do; besides it's only spitting the Phalaris. They had already discharged that accursed Biss and they intend prosecuting the girl. They apologize to you, and promise to raise your wages, but I think that's about all."

"I don't want it," cried Mildred indignantly. "Oh yes, you do; besides it's only spitting the Phalaris. They had already discharged that accursed Biss and they intend prosecuting the girl. They apologize to you, and promise to raise your wages, but I think that's about all."

"I feel you are right," she faltered. Then she covered her face with her hands and sobbed. "But papa, papa, Mr. Wentworth, since all know it now, you must know the truth that is worse than death to me. I feel as if I wanted to hide where no one could ever see me again; I fear we do Mr. Atwood a wrong in permitting him to be so friendly."

Roger towered up until he "looked six feet six," as Belle remarked afterward, and, coming straight to the speaker, he took her hand and said, "Miss Jocelyn, when I'm ashamed to be seen with you and Belle, I'll think twice before I go to a public place. It would be positively wicked to let your trouble break your life, and you are sorely bound to make the best and most of the existence that God has so mercifully bestowed upon you."
