Evening Hours. BY CHARLIE WALTE.

Oh, happy are the hours of night, After the toil and heat of day, When in the starlight clear aed bright We watch the shadows melt away.

Yes, then it is that poets love To dream of things past long ago, And round the hills and dales to reve, While gentle evening breezes blow.

'Tis sweet to hear the bounding deep Rolling along the sandy shore, When all things else are wrapped in sleep And you alone can hear its roar.

'Tis sweet to see it when the stars Reflect wi'hin its crestial blue ; Or when the moon's bright silver bars Float on its crest in purest hue.

Ah, yes, the evening hours are dear, And bring us many a happy thought And yet of times we shed a tear As sad memories to mind are brought

In days the hills we often view When summer sunbeams fall around, Are finer when the evening dew Is watering flowers of the ground.

Tis sweet to hear each little brook

Bolting over the shining sand, weet music coming from each nook, While darkness overspreads the land Sweet n

We love to hear the evening breeze Rustling among the tangled grass, And moaning through the giant trees, While underneath their limbs we pas f Europe."

Yes, evening hours are ever sweet; When gentle summer breezes blow; And oft at night with weary feet 'Bound nature's hills we love to go.
