the general equipment was far from complete. Almost every stage in the process of manufacture was hampered by the lack of trained men and by the crude facilities for handling the goods. The many visitors to the plant during the past two months came away with some conception of the magnitude of the concern, but they had no idea of what still remained to be done to enable the plant to be operated with anywhere near the perfection of which it is capable.

Manager Bradley stated to a Bulletian representative this morning that the plant is beginning to assume somewhat of the design which is outlined in the original plan. One department after another has been added to throughout the entire building. Over $6,000 has been expended in building sheds for the stock. The chutes have been changed, the killing room has been re-arranged and the cooling facilities have been completed.
