

The Draos of Yarrow

An Historical Tale of the Sixteenth Century.

'Beware how you speak,' whispered her brother, as he released her hand. 'Remember the fate of your child and of Gilbert Elliot hangs upon your words.'

'The instant she was released Lady Spens advanced quickly to the priest and threw herself on her knees before him. She seized the rosy which hung suspended from his waist, and holding it up raised her eyes appealingly to his face.'

'Good father, I conjure you by this sacred symbol to save me from those men.' 'She is mad,' thundered Tushielaw, starting forward.

'Back, sirrah,' cried the priest, raising his hands majestically, 'advance one step upon the sacred ground whereon this poor lady rests and the anathema of the Church shall fall upon you with its blight.'

Tushielaw stood still, abashed somewhat by the threat, but not in the least degree turned from his purpose. 'She is mad, I say,' she came here of her own will.

'It was to crave your protection, holy father, it was to cry for mercy at your feet, it was to appeal for help against those who have neither pity, fear, nor mercy.'

'It is with my authority that this union is to be formed,' said Barras harshly. 'What is your authority?' demanded the friar sternly.

The second priest had advanced behind the other as if to support him. 'My authority is that of her brother, and her only guardian.'
