On Gordon's Property.

"Right here," replied Gordon, with an amused smile. "We are sitting on my property now."

"Goodness gracious, I didn't know that," said Mildred, as though she was doing something she ought not to do. "Certainly, that bridge the crosses the brook is at the southern boundary line."

"Oh, I know, I know," Elmer broke in, excitedly. "That road that goes through the big granite posts leads to your house, doesn't it?"

"You've guessed it, Elmer," replied Gordon.

"Well, I declare," said Mildred. "Tell us all about this, Miss Deery," laughed Gordon, emphasizing the last two words as though to recall to her mind that she had called him by his first name not many minutes ago. "There's not much to tell. The road leads to a house and I live in the house. Now, please allow me to ask a few questions. What are you doing up here?"

"Because I had no other place to go," Elmer replied. "She smiled mischievously. Elmer rolled on his back and kicked up his heels."

"Ha, ha, I guess she's got you there, Mr. Kelly," he said. He had been feasting his eyes on the great Gordon Kelly all the while. Mildred watched him with a smile.

"You're right, Elmer," then, turning to Mildred, Gordon said: "But just where do you live? I am very much interested in my neighbors."

"Oh, just on the other side of the brook," on my father's property."

"That can't be your father's property. It is owned by the Southern Land and Development Company."

"Galen Deery is the Southern Land and Development Company," replied Mildred with a little toss of her head.

"Oh, I see," mused Gordon. "And I guess you don't own this property either," declared Elmer, who would stick up for Mildred if it came to a question. "Dad's got a map and it says this land is owned by the Prescott Trust Company."

Gordon laughed. "You win all the arguments, Elmer," he said. "You are right. It was a whim of my father's to put all his land in a company's name. But now that we've found each other out I hope it won't make bad neighbors of us."

"We will have to see about that," replied Mildred, with a sly look.

Red Sox Worried.

The news that Gordon Kelly had left the hospital, packed his trunk and departed from Waterloo, presumably for Boston to join the Red Sox, was flashed over the wires, but as the days passed and nothing was heard of him, the Boston management began to get worried. Telegrams were sent to Atlanta, asking for information, but there was no information to impart. More telegrams were sent to the Atlanta club officials to locate Kelly's home and see if he was there, but no one could be found who knew where his home was. Bill Smith was appealed to, but all he could say was that Kelly had told him he came from the Georgia mountains. This, of course, was of no use.

Two weeks passed and then the Boston club went at the matter in earnest. It had $50,000 tied up in Gordon Kelly, and that was a mighty pile of money to put out for a ball player and not have him show up. At the end of the third week the case was put in the hands of private detectives, and these professionals began a systematic hunt for the missing man. They traced his trunk to the terminal baggage room. They interviewed the expressman who had taken it there. But that as far as they got in that direction. The trunk itself was like hundreds of others and the baggage men, who handled nothing else, could not place it. There was not enough for them to go on, and three weeks is a long time to remember a trunk that is like hundreds of others.

The detectives then went to the mountains but it was like hunting for a needle in a haystack. Many persons in the uplands had heard of Gordon Kelly, the ball player, but they were positive they didn't live anywhere in their section. The detectives searched the county tax lists. There was not a Kelly on them. They began to believe that Gordon Kelly was a fictitious name. If that were so, hunting for a needle in a haystack would be easy in comparison with their task.

Never Heard of Him.

The sleuths even stopped at Peweeck between trains, but those persons whom they inquired truthfully told them they had never heard of a Gordon Kelly and they were positive no such person lived in that vicinity. The detectives then went back to Atlanta to make a fresh start. There they hunted for Gordon Kelly, but that gentleman in that he had the faintest idea of where he had been.

Gordon Kelly was; that he had interest in him whatever. Decidedly, the man who had been hunting for that trunk was not a high-powered detective. He was a man who had been driven by a negro lad, slowed down and stopped at the bridge.

"I'll drive my friends home, Steve," said Gordon to the negro boy. "You wait here until I return."

"Is this your automobile?" cried Mildred in surprise. "Where in the world did it come from?"

"I telephoned for it," replied Gordon, smiling. "Another whim of my father's. He had telephones strung to every corner of the property."

"Gee whiz, that's going some," observed Elmer.

Mildred said nothing. She was thinking of the strange Gordon Kelly, a ball player, who owned a vast estate in the mountains and had servants at his beck and call, who brought automobiles to him as if by magic.
