

A study commissioned by the Carrefour Group in Canada in 2008 conducted interviews with the CEOs of 100 Canadian companies. The study found that 80% of the CEOs had international experience and that 70% of the CEOs had experience in other countries. The study also found that 60% of the CEOs had experience in other industries.

Sustainable competitive advantage

A firm can be considered to have a sustainable competitive advantage in a given market if it is able to maintain a superior position relative to its competitors over a long period of time. This is often achieved through a combination of factors such as a strong brand, a unique business model, or a superior product.

Support of Partners

The support provided to a client by its partners can be a critical factor in its success. This support can take many forms, including financial support, technical support, and marketing support. Partners can also provide valuable insights and advice based on their own experience.

Partners can also provide valuable insights and advice based on their own experience. This can be particularly helpful in identifying new opportunities and avoiding potential pitfalls.

- The client's primary responsibility is to provide the client with the best possible service.
- The client's primary responsibility is to provide the client with the best possible service.

Unique technology or intellectual property with significant barriers to entry

Having a unique technology or intellectual property with significant barriers to entry can be a key factor in a firm's success. This can be particularly true in industries where the technology or property is difficult to replicate.

- The client's primary responsibility is to provide the client with the best possible service.
- The client's primary responsibility is to provide the client with the best possible service.
- The client's primary responsibility is to provide the client with the best possible service.
- The client's primary responsibility is to provide the client with the best possible service.