Dora Deane She was thirty-two, and the prefix which would indicate her a married woman was still wanting from her name. Yet there were no lines of disappointment about Dora Deane's mouth; no troubled expression in the clear gray eyes. Yet she looked a woman to love these years he had never spoken quite and to be loved. She was not beautiful, but people had always called her a presence had renewed her own youth, youthful was the graceful figure and mobile face), until they stopped to reckon on their figures and discovered to reckon on their figures. reckon on their fingers, and discovered form the threshold! the term "woman" was more appropriate. Pry as they would, they could discover no early disappointment, no hidden romance, in all the years she had lived among them. Yet, peeping over her shoulder, as is our privilege, noting the delicate flush upon her cheek, the light in her eye, the trem. bling of the little hand which holds a letter written in firm, bold characters, they might have seized upon a clue we are too generous to fasten or follow.—

The words she had perused were these: "The fever has broken out again quite hotly with us, and I am auxious Cara should breathe purer air. May I drive her out to-morrow and leave her for a fortnight? My messenger will

(Signed) "RONALD RAY." "Of course she might come," thought

Miss Deane. Dear little Cara! Doctor Ray was her guardian. She had been left to his hope to hide it except from her? She care when a little child of three years. She must be eighteen now. For six years she had been at school. Now she had returned to her guardian's home, to remain until some one stole her away grace another. But she was still a child. That was but a remote possibility for the distant future.

Ronald Ray was a physician in the great city in one of whose suburbs was ned her. Had he not heard? The Miss Deane's beautiful home. How dust which had arisen therefrom, blind many years she had known him! He ed her. Could he not see? had even come to her first, in that longago time, to tell her the story of the child confided to his care.

She had been but seventeen herself then, he six years her senior. They had been friends always, but lately she had seen more of him than his usual wont. He had talked with her of Cara's home-coming — of the plans he had matured for her amusement—of the have never loved can little guess how pleasure his mother would experience much !" constantly near her; and she had listened, as she always listened when Ronald Ray talked-listened with a beating heart and fleeting color. But it had hever hetrayed her secret even to him. She had scarce acknowledged it to herself. She only knew that other men might come and go, but were all power. less, even by the most passionate protestations of devotion, to waken that called forth by his simplest word.

But lately he had been different. There had been a light in his eye like that within her own - a suppressed excitement in his manner totally at variance with his usual calm. And now from among his legion of friends he had chosen her home where his ward might

And she impulsively threw her arm about the elder woman's neck. There was a charm-a winsome about her impossible to resist. Dora Deane felt her heart go out toward her anew, as it had done when, a tiny, golden-haired child, she had climbed upon her knee and fallen asleep cradled in her arms.

Cara had been her guest a fortnight, during which time the doctor had fulfilled his promise of devoting to them all his spare moments; but these were very few. The fever was increasing rather than absting. Miss Deane bade fair to have her guest for a long visit.

The three were standing together when she thus spoke, but as she finished, Ronald Ray leaned over, and in a

The moonlight showed the fair, upturned face, and was it only the shadow resting on her own soul which made the older woman fancy that a graver expression was upon it than its wont? She softly stroked the bright hair. "I—I have something to tell you, Miss Dora," the girl went on, after a little pause. "I love you so much that I would like that you should hear it first. But tell me first—am I still a child? And do you think that child-

The Golden Bail Book and since Store is the oldest established in Miranichi. It is now effect we since we commenced business exclusively in the above line, and we can now point with pleasure; to hosts of patrons, who have invariably, purchased from us, during that length of time. The reason is plain. We buy entirely from the best manufacturers, consequently our goods give satisfaction. We might purchase cheap, shoddy goods (that are only meant to sell and not to wear) but by pursuing that policy, it would be impossible to retain our customers. The best goods are the cheapest in the end.
