EDITORIAL NOTES.

No one doubts that, after the capture of Port Arthur and Weihaiwei, the keys of the Gulf of Pechili, the Japanese could have taken Pekin, and this they would have done, had they wished to undertake the stupendous task of substituting a Japanese for a Manchu dynasty in China. The Japanese, however, were too well acquainted with Chinese history to underrate the difficulty of such an enterprise. They knew that success, while, perhaps, attainable, would involve an outpour of blood and treasure for many years, and that the resources of Japan, as and that the resources of Japan, as rier he got, until he was almost ready happened that set me up in life.

The pecuniary indemnity which they exacted was, as the event showed, a bagatelle compared with China's borrowing capability and anymy, and so there were not so many people to go, and they didn't shove the gangplank out with just the elaborate care they commonly display-de—they just ran the end of it up on the stringpiece, because it would only stay there a minute, for the few people that were going, and that was enough.
