refuse boards which are used to feed the furnaces.

These edgings accumulate greatly in the summer months and are run out into the yand, where they are piled, sloping, in stacks, like piles of cordwood, and left to dry.

After a time, and when hundreds of cords have been collected in these stacks, the tops are levelled off, scantling laid at intervals, and thereon boards placed, forming a rude but effective roof for shedding the rain.

Into this immense mass in winter time the men bore for material to replenish the furnace fires, which is run away on trucks built for the purpose. away on trucks built for the purpose. another workman, was considerably In fancy Flannel, Albatross, Lustre, These run on rails between the two bruised, but not seriously. As the fuel was hauled out day after day a wide, roomy space was formed, with a good deal of the material left overhead to serve as a protection roof, from snow and wind to the men engaged in its removal. It seems that although some precautions had been taken by the boss of the gang, Eli Yeomans, to shore up the mass, they were fusufficient to prevent the disaster which resulted in his own instant death and the terrible crushing and wounding of the men working with him.
