FRENCH TROOPS IN CONFLICT WITH MOORS

Fanatical Priest Defeated in Several Engage-eived here state that a French column ander the command of Colonel Gour oud operating against the disaffected Moors in the Adenar region, came into conflict with Sheik Maelainin, the fantical priest of Morocco and defeated him in a number of engagements. The troops, the despetches state, have now reduced the country to some semblance of order. The casualties on the French side were 12 killed and 19 wounded; the tribesmen lost 54 killed and several hundred wounded.

The old woman approached nearer. She flourished her bloe angrily. "Anna Katarenchen, you know as well as I we got to pay that money or we lose the farm. You can't get married till it's paid, can you? No; even such a bad girl, trying to put on little sister, wouldn't want to see her mother and the children on the town. Then let us work—maybe by fall the farm is paid for, and this winter I let you get married."

It was a glorious Northern after- lating with a sign, said limply, "Come, noon; the lake and sky were a uniform blue, the air as clear as crystal, and the shifting breeze equally grateful to the city people winding slowly up the sandy road in an old buckboard whother it blew cold from the lakes or warm and sweet from the sun-baked balsams on the hill.

"Anna Katarenchen, what is that?"
The girl flushed to her high cheekbones and mild blue eyes. Her slow smile was conclinatory, as, after the fashion of the younger immigrants, she answered her mother's German with English.

"I got time for dot, too."

"Time! I don't know what time you've got. We have to iron all evening now. You ain't got time to be informing up ruffles for yourself, I tell you that."

The girl murmured finarticulately.

"What you getting that ready for? Tell me!" the mother persisted. "It ain't Sunday, is it?"

"Manybe Ludvig, he come out onight," the girl explained timidly.

"Tonight! If he does he go home. Who help me with the ironing if that fellar comes here?"

"Louise, she can help. Lena, she can try"

"Louise ain't comin' itome; she waits on the party at the hotel. Lena has sold flowers all day and go to bed, sold flowers all day and go to bed. Sold flowers all day and go to "Why Anna? Tell me."

If ever there was a more engrossing day excepted), as follows:

warm and sweet from the sun-baked balsams on the hill.

Even the old German woman working in a sandy field of burned tree stumps had her pleasure in the day. Behind her poor cabin, sheathed only with builder's paper, she could see the gathering rows of clothes which her daughter was plnning to the line, and felt pleasantly conscious that the sun would bleach them to the whiteness the sunmer people demanded, while the wind whipped them dry for the sunmer people demanded, while the wind whipped them dry for the sunmer people demanded, while the wind whipped them dry for the sunmer people demanded, while the wind whipped them dry for the sunmer people demanded, while the wind whipped them dry for the sun ward to be sunded to the sun would bleach them to the whiteness the sunmer people demanded, while the wind whipped them dry for the stately stalks of the mullein.

The cottage of Maplewood with its quiet spaceousness, the smeared lawn sping to the water's brink, seemed to Anna, after the squalid crowding and clamor of the farm, a vertable Eden. As they billowed grotesquely in the wind these garments claimed momentary allegiance to their owners. A heavy linen walking-skirn needed nothing but hob-nailed shoes for a strenuous golfer, and the ruffled petiticat coquettish planch in the hops. But to the tired old woman in the field they were merely suggestive of the money she was trying to scrape together for a final payment on the barren farm.

Suddenly among the summer florry dancing gaily on the line a coarse, flowered lawn coaled lawn could be gail and the child to a solitude selden disturbed. Sometimes in the present.

"Do you live on a farm, Anna?"

The girl's face clouded. "I'd like it if ve owned dot farm. Ve been trying to pay off on it for six years. So many t'ings happen to our family. It seems like ve ain't had such awful good luck."

"Isn't your father rich, Anna?"
"Mine fadder? He's dead already.

At this point a pale little girl, hitherto hidden by the bulky form of the driver, peered anxiously out of the carriage.

The two ladies also waited expectantly while the girl and her mother held a discussion in German.

"She says she can't spare me," the girl began tentatively, at its conclusion.

"But you will have to," the lady interposed severely. "Look at my little girl; she is not fit to go to the hotel. The work is very easy."

"She says ve make more vashing,"

"Won't your uncle give you any money?"

"His folks vouldn't let him, you bet. He got my fadder to come over here. He lent him the money. Ve haven't been able to get that paid off either. My aunt, she don't like dot. She's got feelings against us." She raised her head spiritedly. "But ve got more feelings in the has."

The little girl's mind wandered.

"It's so awfully different. I have such a good time there. Maybe because I didn't have to vork to hard"

"Won't your uncle give you any money?"

Tonight at the new Star Theatre in North End, the charming Spanish drama, "The Blind Farmer's Daughtern will be presented by the renowned Gaumont Co. of Paris, and it is a long picture of magnificent rural scenes, each or any one of them worthy of a frame. Besides this there will be three new comedies and two other dramas as well as travel views. Miss von Branders will sing and the Star's unexcelled realism will be worked as well. Theatre nice and cosy, show long and as good as money can buy.

"But you will have to," the lady interposed severely. "Look at my little girl; she is not fit to go to the hotel. The work is very easy."

"She says ve make more vashing," the girl demurred "If I go could you pay me ten dollars a veek?"

"Tem dollars! To keep our little cottage and cook for a child?" The ladies were breathless at her effrontery. "I don't pay such a sum as that in town." She addressed the mother as the more responsible of the two, raising her voice in futile effort to better her understanding of English.

"You don't realize that your daughter will get room and board free with me. That ought to make a difference. But this consideration failed to make the desired impression, and the girl repeated with a certain wistfulness, the lady in the sanger of the says of the lady in the sample because I didn't have to vork to hard ven I lived in our dorf."

She passed her hand over her eyes.
