Wamback, who killed his wife and children near Bridgewater, N.S., and then drowned himself, was a fisherman, and generally a soher man, a good husband, and kind father. It is said that he drank hard when last out fishing, and that this set him mad, al-though some of his relatives say that they saw nothing in his appearance or conduct even on the day before, to excite their susions. There was no quarrelling between him and his wife, nor any great misforts him and his wife, nor any great misfortune to account for his madness. He cut his wife's skull open with an axe, as as he lay in bed, inflicting other wounds also, and he cut the threats of his four children, one of them an infant in the cradle. The heads of two of the children were nearly severed from their bodies. He then tied a heavy stone to his feet and another to his neck, and threw himself head foremost into the well, in which there was four feet of water, and in this he was drowned.

An alarm of fire was given on Monday morning, when it was discovered to be in the dwelling house of a Mrs. Moore. The engines were quickly on the spot, and the fire soon extinguished.

There is much doubt as to the real extent of the loss as at Chicago. One estimate parts to the loss in houses at 48 millions, and in goods, wares, machinery, humber, &., at hopoticors, he should give his readers a speak of the loss as an unnting to 300 millions more. The Chicago Tribuse speaks of the loss as an unnting to 300 millions, and one of the Insurance appraisers is said to have put it at 200 millions, and one of the language and the seasons of value of all the red and personal property of Chicago in 1870 was but 275 millions, and that allowing amply for any possible increases it could not be more than 300 millions. It is now stated that only six elevators were destroyed and that eleven remain uninjured. The liabilities of the Insurance companies, it is now said, amount to 70 millions, and as these will nearly all be met the actual loss of property to the people of Chicago, if the Herald's estimates are at all reliable, will not be so heavy after all. It is gratifying too untrue; for if it were not, any person of or from last month. An elaborate review of Herald's estimates are at all reliable, will not be so heavy after all. It is gratifying two to learn that the loss of life is now thought not to be so great as was at one time supposed. A late report says that it does may prove exceed two hundred, and that many supposed to be lost have been found.

Governor Bross says the assissed value was far below the actual value and that the loss is 300 millions.—St. John Freeman.
