butes to us sinister motives in making the communi-cation. His version of the story is, that the mail bag in which the letters in question were contained, was lost somewhere between Shediac and St. John.

letters posted here are for better security registered and paid for; —they do not arrive at their destination; -application is made to the Post Office authorities at St. John, who state, that no such letters have passed through their hands. That there has been negligence and inattention somewhere there cannot Lard, be a doubt, and we merely ask for a solution of the Flour a money letter, there is no obligation, as we take it, imposed on the Post Office to take care that the letter is properly transmitted to its destination; and if it do not arrive there, to afford some good and suffic reason why it has not. It is not enough for the Postmaster at the place where the letter was posted and registered, to say, I put it in a mail bag which 1 gave to the officer of the mail boat, and he tells me that he gave the mail bag to the Postmaster at that he gave the mail bag to the Postmaster at Shediac, and then to draw the conclusion "that the department here should not be held accountable for the loss." Mr. Davies will perhaps find that he is mistaken in the law he so complacently lays down for his own security. Mr. Davies "regrets that no further information, up to the present moment, has been received, though a most diligent enquiry is in measures on the schedt". We should like to know progress on the subject." We should like to know what the nature of such diligent enquiry can be. With the aid of electric telegraphs, railroads and steamboats, one would think that all the information required might be obtained in eight-and-forty hours, at furthest. Does the Postmaster at Shediac admit that he received the mail bag in question,-and if so, what did he do with it? Mr. Lund, w presume, gave Mr. Davies a receipt for the bag directed to St. John; and we also presume that Mr. Lund took a receipt from the Postmaster at Shediac. Where is the difficulty then? Somebody must be liable. The office here is liable to the person posting the letter, and the other post-offices are lia-ble to the Postmaster here. Mr. Davies compares himself to a consigner of goods. May he not with more propriety be considered as the carrier, bound to deliver the article entrusted to him to the per-son to whom it is directed?
