Leighton always hated himself for laughing at Balcomb, whose loquacity was so cheap that it was pathetic. Everything Balcomb knew he used constantly. At the college to which he referred in terms of raillery or contempt he had picked the nearest and ing walk.
"A remarkable man, your father, gaudiest flowers; but he wore them all an amazing bouquet that did not fail to impress many of his acquaintances as the real bloom of learning. Leighton was not at all glad to see Balcomb tonight. His friend's eternal freshness palled upon him. But it did not occur to Balcomb that Leighton might not be delighted to have him for a traveling companion. He thought his conversation was shortening the distance for Leighton. Balcomb had been making social history fast. He in his own phrase, "butted in; and since the performance of "Deceivers Ever," he had been included in most of the gatherings of the Dramatic Club circle.

"I say, old man," he began abruptly, as the car skimmed through a strip of woodland, "just between old college" of the green, green wood to buy the green, green goods—you know how those old ballads run—we studied 'em friends, what's your game, anyhow? at college-but I guess I'd be pretty

'Which is what?" demanded Leighton, who had been enjoying a moment with his own thoughts, while Balcomb stared out upon the darkling land-

"Which girl, I mean? There are two out here.' Leighton took off his hat and laughed. "I haven't decided yet," he said presently, with an irony that was quite lost on Balcomb. "I'm a good fellow, though, and I'll take the one you

"I think a man ought to marry early," Balcomb announced, as they tramped along the road. "There's sure hers is all new. It's delightfully nothing like a woman and a home to put snap into a man," he continued nobly. "A man fools away a whole lot of money in his bachelor days. Doing social stunts is expensive. Have you any idea what my carriage bill was last March? Eighty-four dollars! I honestly believe it would pay me to own a hack. But, I say, the man who will drag a girl to the theater in a street car is fit for treason, stratagems and the stone pile. It ain't enough to put 'em on four wheels when it's snowing; no, I make a specialty hacks under the starry hosts heaven, and eke the pale and haughty THREE HEAT PLAN AT moon. There's no better way than that to get solid with a girl. There are some that put their faith in bonbons and a new novel now and then; but there isn't a girl in Mariona tonight that wouldn't rather go to see a good show in comfort than do anything else under the sun. Hang that June bug! it nearly choked the life out of me. I say, about hacks, don't give it away, but I've just got a transfer company pass-Wilson, the president, and I are pretty thick, and I do a little quiet work for the company occasionally. I helped 'em beat the vehicle tax before the council last winter, and I have an annual now that gives me power of life and death over all the company's rolling stock night and day. And you bet I won't use it or anything!" Leighton's silence did not disturb Balcomb; he talked for the joy it gave
