KNOWLEDGE IS POWER.

"Lord Bacon, or Lord Bacon's index-maker, used the aphorism, "Knowledge is power." The remark was as old as Solomon (for he had said "Wisdom is strength,") and perhaps a great deal older; but the truth it taught was valuable; and truth being no man's indefeasible possession, it belonged noither to Solomon, nor to Bacon, nor the index-maker, but to everybody. Who discovered it first is of no particular importance.

That knowledge is power does not, of course, stand good in every case; the aphorism is of general application. Thus a man knows letters, and he has power to become the intimate associate, the friend and companion of all the great men whose writings are preserved in the language he understands. Every new acquisition of a foreign tongue gives him an introduction to those foreign worthies whose books are untranslated, and makes him grow more intimate with those who have been "done" into his native tongue. Again, a knowledge of the elements of nature, their properties and characteristics, and their action on each other, gives him the ability to employ them in his service—to harness those four ancient coursers. fire, water, earth and air, to the car of his inventive genius.

Knowledge is power in another sense-with the money-maket, to wit. He whose speculations are the result of careful thought and well-digested information is scarcely to be considered a speculator after all. A neophyte on 'Change, with the learning of all the schools in his head but that of the school of life, would be at the mercy of the jobbers. A knowledge of the world, in men and things, is the grand secret of success in commercial enterprise. Such knowledge is power—the power of accumulating wealth and building up a fortune.

In any way you please the aphorism is true: true of the engineer building his battery; of the statesman in his political schemes; of the speculator in his dashing enterprise; of the murderer compounding his subtle poison; of the analytical chemist outwitting the poisoner; of all-everywhere.
