Sir Arthur Currie,
Pres. McGill Univ.,

Dear Sir:-

Sometime ago, I believe an offer was made by Lord Atholstan, for a graduate or undergraduate in medicine who could find a cure for Cancer.

In my work as a druggist I meet quite frequently an elderly gentleman who has proved to be quite a genius in many ways. He has a cure that he claims cured cancer with him and has given the remedy to several others whose claim that the doctors failed to cure and all seem of the one opinion that his remedy has done wonders for them. As he looks to me for a good deal of advice I thought it best to write you directly. Would you advise him placing his remedy in the hands of some competent medical man to demonstrate its worth? or what course would you advise him to pursue? yours truly,
J. C. McElliand
