A MARRIAGE AT SEA.

BY W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor," "An Ocean Tragedy," etc.

Continued. "But just now—did not the yacht turn over? Something was broken on deck, and the men began to shriek."

"As did you, Grace," said I, trying to smile. "But if we should be drowned?" she cried, drawing herself closer to me and fastening her sweet, terrified eyes upon my face.

I shook my head, still preserving my smile, though Heaven knew, had my countenance taken its expression from my mood it must have shown as long as the yacht herself. I could observe, her straining her ears to listen, whilst her gaze—large and bright, her brows arched, her lips parted, her breast swiftly heaving—remained over the cabin.

"What is that noise of thunder, Herbert?" "It is the wind," I answered. "Are not the waves getting up?" Oh, feel this," she cried, as the yacht rose with velocity and nothing of violence or chasing sea, of a power that was but too suggestive of what we were to expect.

"The Spirit is a staunch, noble little craft," said I, "built for the North Sea weather. She is not to be daunted by anything that can happen hereabout."

"But what has happened?" she cried, irritable with alarm. "I was about to utter the first reassurance sentence that occurred to my mind, when the yacht—over which it was a little while back, and I just caught sight of a pair of legs over the cabin—was suddenly and without warning, another yell and blast of wind as had before nearly stretched me. Grace shrieked and threw her arms round my neck; the cover was closed, and the interior instantly beamed again.

"What's that?" I roared, my right hand, "Mr. sir," roared a voice out of the blackness where the companion-steps stood. "Flee, sir. The yacht is sinking. Do not step below to report what has happened. He doesn't have the deck himself."

I released myself from my darling's clinging embrace and lighted the lamp for the third time. "Flee, sir," roared a voice out of the blackness where the companion-steps stood. "Flee, sir. The yacht is sinking. Do not step below to report what has happened. He doesn't have the deck himself."
