Drusilla." he said; "seeing that I am here because I am yours—because you belong to me."

She grew hot and then she felt cold, and the color faded utterly out of her face.

'Please don't talk nonsense," she said. "If you are here, you alone know why you have come. I gave you no invitation."

He bit his lip, and suddenly put his hand out and laid it on her arm, but she drew back quickly, so quickly that she silpped from under his touch.

"Are you sure that you won't have some tea before you go?" she asked. "By the way, how far have you to go?" We know most of the people staying about here."

"I'm not staying with friends," he said quietly. "I am putting up at the inn in East Wadley."

Drusille said: "I am sorry," with a silpped said: "I am sorry," with a pression of talk nonsence. If I had been like the others."

"If you had been like the others," said Carlingford, with conviction, "I shouldn't be here today."

"They had moved on slowly, and were now in view of the house, where the motor-car was drawn up waiting.

With a delightful and irrestible sesture the young man held out his hand.

"Aren't you going to say you are a little sorry for me?" he wispered. "I am staying at a wretched little inn. I am going to have a long, dreary evening. I've only got my thoughts of you to keep me company."

"Why did you come?" asked Drusilla nervously. Don't you see that you side that you have done a dread-tul thing in engaging a strange young man to be your librarian."

"Let us hope things won't be quite so bad," said Bertha, with a faint smile.

Two thousand feet higher up the mountains it was bitterly cold at night but the natives could stand it without any clothing at all. At night they have a process of providing themselves with fire. They carry on scarcely any trade, and live mainly on plantains and potatoes, the latter having been introduced by missionaries in 1855.

A SIGHT OF THE SNOWY MOUNTAINS.

(From a Signapore Correspondent.)
After two years among the savages in Dutch New Guinea, Mr. Pratt. British naturalist, and his two sons have returned to Samarang, Java, with strange experiences to tell.
Mr. Pratt is a seasoned explorer of fifty-flev years. His travels have extended over wide territories in China, Thirst, South America, and Asia Minor. He had four years in the British and Dutch sections of New Guinea, and then took a vacation in Great Britain.
Two years ago he came out with his two sons and landed at Doreh, in Gelevink Bay, where missionaries nave been stationed for over fifty-gray. Behind Doreh stretch the Arfak Mountains, with two large lakes lying at a height of eight thousand feet above the sea. There the naturalists took up their quarters, in the midst of savage Papuans, whose characteristics they soon discovered were untrustworthiness and thirst for blood,
They were right on the extreme fringe of the Dutch authority, so had to look after themselves to the utmost. They found the savages far below the African natives without knowledge or understanding of the most.
