He deplored the lack of parental control, and said that too many boys were allowed to run wild at nights in cities and towns with the inevitable result that they went to picture shows, where they picked up ideas that in many cases led to crime or petty misdemeanors. Mr. Scott said he thought that too many subjects were being taught in schools, instead of the schools sticking to essentials.

President J. W. Smith of the inspectors' section, pointed out that education was a question of doing a few essential things well and doing them without strain. The aim of teachers, he said, should not be to cram the brains of the young, but to teach them habits of study, to develop interest in new fields, and to encourage fresh mental activities after the pupils have left school.
