you were absolutely certain that you would never like me very much better than you did then,"

"I am sorry again," says Griselda. "But I'm afraid I can't go back of that either."

"You must," decisively.

"Must' is for the king, and 'shall' is for the queen," retorts she saucily, and I have yet to learn that you are the proud possessor of a crown. Who then shall make me?"

"I shall," declares Mr. Peyton, dread meaning in his eye. "To begin with, I shall keep you here until you retract in full. I shall," suiting the action to the word, "hold on to this shoe ribbon until you have gone back of every word you then said."

"If I stayed here until to-morrow's dawn—if I stayed here for ever, I shouldn't do that," returns she hotly.

"All right, I'm perfectly willing."

dawn—if I stayed here for ever, I shouldn't do that," returns she hotly.

"All right. I'm perfectly willing to stay here forever."

"I wouldn't be silly if I were you," says she, trying to move the foot in prison without result, and growing a trifle uneasy. Of course he doesn't mean it, but still—"Mr. Peyton." with a sudden touch of hauteur, "let me go at once. She stamps rather sagrily with the unfettered foot upon the ground and threatens him with a peir of lovely indignant eyes, that flash all sorts of reprisals, but, Peyton who is surely brave above his fellows, returns her glance unmoved and holds on manfully to the other—the captured foot.

It is rather an absurd position, no doubt, but the situation has its compensations, it leaves him at least, as he fondly believes, master of the field, and he clings to it—the foot—with a Sparian fervour not to be shaken.

"I have you now at all events," he says grimly, giving the ribbon he is holding a little vicious pull just for the satisfaction of showing her how completely she is in his power. How can she run away without her foot?

Against the golden splendour of the sun.

"Your shoe is untied," he says slowly as if fulfilling an unpleasant duty, and with quite an access of gloom.

"Is it? What a worry these shoes are " says Griselda, standing still to east a reproachful glance at the ribbons of this troublesome, if charming shoe. "I never come out, I never indeed have them on for five minutes, without being made absolutely wretched by them."

his knees before her and proceeds to reduce the fluttering ribbons to order.

Apparently simple, as it see it takes an enormous time to this. The tying of an ordinary bow knot, one would imagine, being an not of every-day occurrence, could not occupy the better part of five minutes in the doing of it, yet so it is. All ye who are ignorant of the matter learn now this wondrous fact, that it took Mr. Peyton, who was by no means a dunderhead, gaite the twelfth part of an hour to bring the younger Miss Dysart's shoe strings into a proper frame of mind.

It is not carelessness either that has rendered his movements slow. To the most inattentive observer it must be plain that he has thrown his whole soul into his task, yet it seems difficult of completion.

"Don't you think it would be wise to call in assistance?" suggests she sweetly after a bit. "It seems a little too much for you."

Something in her tone kills within him all animosity. He laughs, "Griselda," says he, still kneeling and looking up at her with imploring eyes, "tell me you didn't mean what you said to me."
