THE TEN-MILLIONTH PASSENGER.

Not every passenger crossing the Atlantic has the pleasant surprise which was given a Hungarian emigrant named Viszily a short while ago. When he went to Bremen to get his ticket for the voyage to New York by the Norddeutscher-Lloyd liner George Washington a congratulatory and smiling official of the company told him that he would be permitted to travel free, and, not only so, but that he would be given a superior berth in the third class instead of the steerage. The astonished and delighted Vassily thereupon inquired why he was to be so favored, and learned, says the "Railway and Travel Monthly," that it was all on account of certain figures on his ticket. It bore the number 10,000,000, and therefore, he was the ten-millionth passenger to be carried by the company across the Atlantic. In celebration of this unique event the company was granting him the special privilege of a free passage to the land of the free.

WHERE "STERLING" ORIGINATED.

In England money is characterized by the word "sterling," because in the time of Richard Cœur de Lion money coined in the east part of Germany became, on account of its purity, in special request in England, and was called Easterling money, as all the inhabitants in that part of Germany were called Easterlings. That was the foundation of the practice of designing English amounts "sterling."
