NORAH CUSHALEEN HAUNTED CASTLE.

'Oh, I know, I know,' returned the factor. 'I was on yon height, and saw the whole affair. But because he chanced to be loitering about and helped you over the stile, I don't see that there should be such familiarity. You may, perhaps, if you feel inclined, pay him a little for the service rendered you but—'Harkee, Mr. O'Brady,' interrupted Hargreave, as he calmly confronted him,' you should understand that I am not a tenant on the estate who is unfortunately obliged to submit to your impertinence. Neither is this lady, whose name I have just heard for the first time from you, a fit object for your coarse and uncalled for interference. You will therefore, if you please, walk away; else I shall be obliged to adopt unpleasant measures towards you.'
'Oh, perhaps you'll strike me,' roared O'Brady, with a vindictive laugh.—'Do—do, and I'll raise an action of damages, though, I suppose, I would get little from a poor, beggardly painter fellow, who gees about the country like a vagabond. Your enraged are you, because I have warned Miss Kendal against you? Perhaps you've been passing yourself off to her as something great, and don't like anybody to expose you. A pretty fellow you are to put on airs and give me anybody to expose you. A pretty fel-lew you are to put on airs and give me insolence. I've a good mind to have you taken up for trespass.'

'Oh, pray leave him, air,' whispered Mary earnestly, 'he is beneath your no-tres.'

Mary earnestly, 'he is beneath your notice.'

'You are right, Miss Kendal,' he returned," the proper treatment for such a shall accompany you on your road to Kendal Castle.

'If you please, sir,' said Mary, being nervously anxious to get him out of the reach of the factor's insults; and in her eagerness she frankly and confidently put her arm in his, and without deigning to cast another look on O'Brady, they walked on, Dash quietly following them.

'Not a bit o' me likes the look of that,' he muttered. 'He's just the smooth, oily fellow that's fit to get round a simple gurl, and it's a catch that the needy adventurer will be sure to try for. And faith that won't do for me at all, at all; for if Malvrin Blantire doean't marry her, he'll never be able to pay off me bond, and not a farthing of the money will I ever see; for Blantire was cunning enough not to let me know the estate was mortgaged, even beyond its value, when he got my fifteen hundred pounds. His marriage with Mary Kendal is my only chance, and if I don't take care this fellow may apoil it. I must put Malvrin on his guard, and get him to hook his fish at once, and as for that Englishman or Scotchman, or whatever he is, I'd like to take the insolence out of him.—little he knows the power of the man he is braving.'

While Jacob O'Brady was thus solilo-While Jacob O'Brady was thus solilo-quising, the two subjects of his dark thoughts were slowly walking towards Kendal Castle and in a pleasant state of feeling which made them entirely forget that such a person as Jacob O'Brady ex-isted. The circumstances that had brought them into contact with each other were such as to break down at once those barriers that an acquaintance be-gun in the ordinary way would have tak-en weeks or months to remove. Mary could not but be frank and cordinal to the en weeks or months to remove. Mary could not but be frank and cordial to the youth who had saved her life; and Hargreave—naturally open and unreserved—met the grateful contidence of the maiden with a generous feeling. In short, before they had got half-way to Kendal Castle, they were on the best of terms, their minds and tastes evidently responded to each other, the sertiments of one found a ready echo in the other's breast, and that pleasure which is derived from a correspondence of feeling took possession of both.

breast, and that pleasure which is derived from a correspondence of feeling took possession of both.

It was not long till they met again—not by appointment—apparently by accident, and yet each secretly rejoiced that they had met. Again and yet again did they meet, growing happier and happier in each other's company, till they were both as deeply in love as their fresh rich natures could allow.

Mary Kendal scarcely paused to consider the propriety of what she was doing. She rendered up her heart to the attractive youth without one misgiving thought. He was in his looks, words and actions so manly, noble, and true, she could not possibly doubt him. The shadow of suspicion did not nonce cross she could not possibly doubt him. The shadow of suspicion did not once cross her spirit, for she regarded him with a sweet sense of trust and reliance. The faith which grows out of love is a pure, unclouded, steadfast faith.

Hargreave found in Mary Kendal his ideal of woman, and having found her he was not slow to lavish the affection of his great nature upon hor. She was the gentle, intelligent, and affectionate which he had deemed a true woman to be. Utterly free from art and affectation—full of warm feeling, high thoughts and lofty desires, she answered in all respects the thoughts, feelings and aspirations of his own mind, and what could he wish more? He was satisfied, and Mary took an undisputed place in his undivided heart.
