Chard Gould yielded—an easy, good-ired soul he was, swayed with the wind in daway the lot went, through the rain mud, to the Pig and Whistle received them with respect. It had got a blazing fire and a mi, light room to welcome them; and is enconced in it with their pipes and k, they were as oblivious of homes, es, chi dren, and weekly marketings, as such things existed not. A few, who de' the house regularly, called for their es on entering and settled up for the saven day. The Pig and Whistle was a rishing house now, for the workmen, of or a long while had been engaged thing the new bridge in place of the danuel of the had been engaged.

recting the new bridge in place of the dangerous old one had patronized it extensively. Meanwhile Richard Gould's wife was sitting at home, in all hope. They occupied one of the cottages in Prospect Row, neath wellings of three rooms and a detached buck kitchen; or, as it was called in local buck kitchen; or, as it was called in local buck kitchen; or, as it was called in local buck kitchen; or, as it was called in local buck kitchen; or, as it was called in local the works, but there was a wide difference in their conduct, and consequently, in their in their conduct, and consequently, in their homes. Some drank their wages away, and the works, but there was a wide difference in their conduct, and consequently, in their homes. Some drank their wages away, and she in the down-stairs room and the brew-house letting the two other ones. Some of the wives were slatternly wife and their wise were slatternly wife and the wines, converting the brew-house into a kindle of these cottages complete pleasant bomes, converting the brew-house into a kindle of these cottages complete pleasant bomes, converting the brew-house into a kindle of the second of the second of the work-the washing and cooking—and the front room into a parlor. Jessy Gould, smart and nice in all things, was one who had done the last, fitting the most of the workmen of his grades more than he could afford, and this great work finishing a child's freek, and expecting feet helped them, so that they were better off than most of the workmen of his grades and return the parlor, busy at work finishing a child's freek, and expecting feet helped them, so that they were better off than most of the workmen of his grades and return the parlor, busy at work finishing a child's freek, and expecting feet helped them, so that they were better off the work with a story of the strength of the work with a state of the work w

In the next cottage to theirs lived a man of the name of 'Reed, an inferior workman, for the name of 'Reed, an inferior workman, Mrs. Reed was in tribulation more dire than Jessy's, and was audibly lamenting that this was Saturday night, and that Reed had gone a-drinking again. She knew to her cost the propensity' he had to "go a-drinking," not only on Saturday nights, but on others. The first step was togo after him and try to get him home before he was too far gone, and half his week's money spent. She threw a shawl over her gown, put on her bonnet, blew out the candle, left the bit of fire safe, and opened the door. But she hesitated on the threshold, for the wind and hesitated on the threshold, for the wind and hesitated on the threshold, for the wind and through. "Come in."

"Good-evening, Mrs. Gould. I'm come to sak you to let me leave my key here."

She left her patiens at the door, and went in. "Ain's it a shame?" she began. "Here's hat drunken brute of mine never come hat drunken brute of mine never come hat drunken brute of mine never come had knows I have nost gat bit of rop in the house for to-morrow, neither canden, nor coals, nor even a bit of soop, I had to put 'em to bed dirty."

"Ay, it is a shame," said Mrs. Gould. "They are all silke, I think. My husband Thoy are all silke, I think. My husband promised to come home and he has never come. We are invited to Mr. Harding's to come. We are invited to Mr. Harding's to come. We are invited to Mr. Harding's to come. Jessy thought to herself that he had drank away far more than he ought of it, but she did not say so.

"Won't you sit down, Mrs. Reed?"

"Law, no! 'Pm off to find him out, and get some money from him. It's hard lines with us, at the best, since our lodgers left, and it's harder when he gets drunk on wages night, for then the money moits like butter. Not but what I'm loath to leave your free, and turn out into it; so comfortable as you are, to be sure!"

The woman moved to the door as she spoke. The rain was coming (down in torrents.

"You will get a dreadful soaking," exclaimed Mrs. Gould. "Have you an umbrella ?"

Away she clanked in her pattens, through the garden gate and along the road. The first thing the wind did was to take the "crazy old umbrella," and turn it inside out which of the public-houses she might find which of the public-houses she might find chein in the rain, not knowing at which of the public-houses she might find diction in her heart on all of them. successfully. It was a weary search, and she grew disheartened, she was wet to the skin, and returned to Prospect Row, hoping he had gone home.

"Has he been for the key?" she asked, pitting her head inside Mrs. Gould's door. "No, here it is. Have you seen anything of my husband?"

"I have seen nothing of either of them. I wish the beer-houses were burned!" added Mrs. Reed, in exasperation. "What a life is mine, to be thed to such a sot!"

Back again to the search. She must have money for her markelings, and she must try and prevent him getting intoxicated. Just before II o'clock, the hour when the snope closed, she heard where he was. An acquaintance, bent on the same errand as herself, gave her the information that he, and about fifteen others, were at that noted public, the Pig and Whistle, "atoping theirselves stupid."

"All that way!" exclaimed poor Mrs. Reed. She went splashing wearily on, till she arrived at it, and she asked to see him. He came sullen'y out of the tap-room, pipe in mouth, chafing at the jokes of his companions, who asked him if he was in leading strings that his missis must come after him. He was fresh, not yet worse, and in a shocking humor, for drink always put him in one, though he was a civil man when quite sober.

"What do I want?" she retorted, "why money, for one thing. You know the house is empty. Coals, and candles, and bend, tea, and potatoes, and soap, and salt, and meat—"

He stopped her with an oath, threw down five shillings, and told her to go along and tea, and potatoes, and soap, and salt, and meat—"
