bat.—Running the gauntlet, and gallant conduct of one Moore . . . . .	136

CHAPTER IX.

Feast of green corn analysed and described.—Singular coincidence between this, and certain ancient Jewish customs.—Sharp fight for the best place.—Considerable smoking going on.—Speech of an old Indian: great applause thereat.—Sports and games delineated.—Racing and wrestling.—Liberal feast at the close.—Absurd trial of strength.—Dancing, accompanied by music: the latter not over and above melodious.—The meeting degenerates into drunkenness and quarrels.—These mischiefs traced to drinking ardent spirits.—The sons of Belial equally offensive in all places.—Melancholy instance of the effects of intemperance.—What makes men to differ in moral worth? The grace of God, and that only . 153

CHAPTER X.

The author becomes a valuable servant; that is, a hewer of wood and drawer of water.—Ingratiates himself into the good-will of his owners by the capture of a rabbit.—Finds the guidance of divine Providence in the mazes of the tangled wilderness.—Chain of circumstances developed, tending to his deliverance.—Indian preparations for war.—Predictions of an old lady: right for once, at any rate.—Victory obtained by the red men.—Battle between the author and a wild animal.—Merciful deliverance.—Indian genealogy.—Grown gentlemen taught to dance.—Sad rupture between the
