"Did they object to the increase in the admission charges?" he was asked.

"Well, not much to that, but I'll bet you that one out of every five men who motored in, was pinched.

"But doesn't the county council appoint the county constables?" he was asked.

The answer was in the affirmative, but it was intimated that the constables had been over-zealous in their devotion to duty, and had taken the names of people who were noted as slow drivers and could ill-afford to pay fines for slightly exceeding the limit of progress through the speed-traps. Instances were given of county people whose names had been taken, but against whom prosecution had been dropped following local representations in protest.
