WRITES SHORTHAND 300 WORDS A MINUTE

A new record for speed in shorthand writing was made on Jan. 18 by Herman J. Stich of 961 St. Nicholas Avenue, New York City, a court reporter in the Brooklyn children's court and teacher in the College of the City of New York, at an official competition of the Isaac Pitman Shorthand Writers' Association. Mr. Stich took testimony from a court reporter dictated at the rate of 300 words a minute for five minutes and transcribed it, with only two errors for each minute. Most of the free-for-all speed contests since 1911 have been won by Nathan Heiter, who was not a competitor at the trial where Mr. Stich made his record.

The record of 300 words a minute is possible only on paper taken from the count records where most of the words are monosyllables and where many of the questions and answers are stereotyped and where whole clusters of words are represented by brief symbols. Mr. Stich's record for writing "straight matter" is 200 words a minute, with five errors. This was made in an official competition where editors from the New York Times were read. One hundred and eighty words a minute had been previously considered the highest practicable speed at which difficult matter could be written in shorthand.

Mr. Stich is twenty-five years old, and started to learn shorthand five years ago to earn extra money while he was making his way through the College of the City of New York. In a year he could write shorthand at the rate of 120, and won a contest at that speed for writers under twenty-one years of age. He had made a practice of using editorials from the New York Times for speed training, and now uses them regularly. His classes because of the variety of subjects and the range of vocabulary.

Mr. Stich's main device for speed training, in addition to taking dictation and speeches, had been that of writing out matter in shorthand in a notebook leaving a space of five blank lines between the written lines. Then, beginning at the beginning, he reads the notes aloud and writes them again in shorthand on the line immediately underneath. This is continued until the blank lines are filled. By the use of this device, the student gets practice in reading his notes at the same time that he is dictating to himself and errors or bad style in writing come to his attention and call for correction.

loans to the Allies, by the United States Government, by Great Britain with $25,000,000 and France with $35,000,000, Canada's borrowings are divided as follows: Government, $180,000,000. Provincial and municipal, $116,000,000. Corporate, $166,600,000.

Loans to the Allies of $7,800,000,000, the United States is now a creditor of other nations for $10,000,000,000. There is at present a considerable agitation in the United States that more money be loaned to Canada, as it will increase the power of that country as a creditor nation, and also help to offset the heavy adverse balance of trade due to our importing much more from the republic than we sell there.
