The domestics left in a tantrum, threatening to sue him for the amount; and he was quite alone in his house.

This being such an uncomfortable state of things, he soon followed his servants' example, and, packing up what he wanted purposed to take up his abode for a while at an hotel. The last thing he did before he quitted the house was to take his money from the safe. He counted it and found it right; then he looked for the pocket book full of papers which were too valuable and important to leave behind him. The pocketbook was gone. He turned all the papers in the chest upon the floor, and found it was undoubtedly missing. It was a long time before he could believe it; nor did he quite give up hope until he had searched every pocket of every article of clothing he owned, ondering if he could have left it in either. No: he could distinctly remember that the last time he went to the safe the book was there. He remembered seeing and handling it. It was gone-stolen, and stolen for a

He directed many o his remarks to himself, but many more to his absent wife ; but not for a moment d.d he knew the key had never been out of his sion—so far as he knew, for he hought of those hours when he lay insensible to touch and deaf to all sounds-dead drunk. That night Josephine had left him, but before leaving had taken the key and had ransacked his private safe. It could be no one else. Another would have taken the money, and left the document. The act was Josephine's, but the instigation Mr. Bourchier's. That was why she had lived so long with him after domestic comfort became mockery-it was simply to wait for this opportunity, which at last his own folly had made for her. The thing was clear as daylight. He threw the worthless papers back into the box, locked it, and went downstairs to think-with the assistance of brandy and water-to what extent this miexpected loss jeoparded his interest.
