Interesting article on Immigration and the Centralization of Effort, by Donald Mann.

We have just passed through an era of great activity in railway building, and the years which span this era were equally memorable in immigration. It will be remembered that in the closing years of the nineteenth century, immigration into Canada was dormant: In the year 1897 there came into Canada, if we are to believe the government's returns, only 21,716 immigrants, am insignificant contribution to the population of a country with an area of habitable, productive land far greater than that possessed by the Central Powers with which the Allies are at war. In the same year there were 2,384 homesteads taken up by colonistis, and this in a country with millions of acres of vacant land capable of cultivation! Canada was doing worse than standing still, for in those days of sparse immigration she was subject to a constant drain of her best young men to the United States.

Faith in the outstanding, enduring wealth of the country, and a desire to see progress counted in decades rather than in centuries, led to a decision, which was nothing short of a national revolution, that the undeveloped resources should be made accessible. The public mind was seized and provincial governments upon whom devolved the responsibility of devising the ways and means for increasing the population and development of the country. During the first decade of the new century, no other question displaced in the public imagination of the country.

One of your correspondents, who, by the way, is also a railway men.

Total miles.

Total miles which are commencement, a very real relationship between railways and immigration? Immigration followed the new railway construction, gaining year after year additional force and, instead of the 21,716 people who came into Canada in the twelve months of 1897, 402,432 came into Canada in 1913, when the movement was at its crest, and, best of all, the records of the Destriment of the Interior show that the homestead entries, and land brought under settlement, were in proportion to immigration.

As a result of this railway construction, and the consequent tide of immigration, a new spirit took hold of the country. Men ceased to talk of Canada as slow and unprogressive, and spoke of it as the land of opportunity. The road to fortune no longer led southwards, and Canada, having given her young men by the hundreds of thousands to the United States began reches and to receive them back, and with them brain and brawn from the citles and farms of the American Republic. The industrial activities of the country were quickened. The foreign trade of the country grew, doubled and quadrupled, until today placed in diagrammatic form, it looks like a pyramid impide down.

There is an almost irresistible tempation to tell of the marvellous increase in grain production, and the growth in the output of "made in Canada" commodities. But why repeat a story famous the world over, and the experience of which is the main inspiration of the series of articles that have appeared? We learned then that immigration meant wealth production, and having only worked the surface of our undeveloped resources—with a comparatively unlimited supplied to the country of natural resources left for future & ploitation—we are deeply anxious shor further and greater immigration, and through it further and greater intended to the country of natural resources left for future & ploitation—we are deeply anxious shor further and greater immigration, and through it further and greater intended to the prince of the country of the countr
