The visit of Her Majesty took these three soldiers by surprise: indeed, one of the cooks, hearing that Her Majesty had left the Palace, and wishing to catch a sight of her, was in the act of rushing out of the door when Her Majesty entered. Both cooks had divested themselves of their jackets, and with their shirt sleeves tucked up, they felt rather taken a back. Her Majesty first took notice of the stalwart Highlander, in full.

was believed by many that the Washington Government desired to repeat the game played with the Charendon-Johnson Treaty—obtain as many concessions as possible from Great Britain, and then bring the Conference to a close by increasing their demands. This belief was in a measure justified by the placing of our claims for consequential damages in the "case" presented at Geneva; but the conduct of the Washington Government has been so conciliatory since England refused to proceedwith the arbitration on the basis of the American case that no one can doubt their desire to at once and forever settle room. She asked if the benches were the sleeping places of the men, and on being answered in the affirmative, the Queen was pleased to state that the whole place was clean and tidy. Her Majesty then advanced and spoke to the cooks—Grant and Wilson by name. She watched their operations a few moments. Wilson, who on the entrance of Her Majesty had been making a practical experiment as to whether the potatoes he was cooking were sufficiently boiled, was rather put about; and he could only Tay down his "dist-clout," touch his forage-cap, and in reply to Her Majesty's question, stammer out with great difficulty, "potatoes, your Majesty."
