So they settled Tom opposite ye, no less. Will ye shpake to him now—pass the time of day to him?"

Mollie's color rose; she knew what old Bid had come for. Gossips must live. But reserve has no part in an Irish woman's heart and bitterness which she nursed came pouring out.

"Shpake is it! Shpake, Mrs. Naylan, ma'am! The cool assurance of the felly to land himself opposite me very dour, with owd Hannie Magee, that has two feet in the grave, to kape house for him. of Mollie's unabated rancour would earn dinner and tea on the morrow.

Mollie sat silent, peering needlessly into the tea-pot, clattering cups and plates while the red surged sullenly in her cheeks.

Now, twenty years before, Mollie Dayly and Tom Doolan had been promised to each other. It was no made match, but the mutual attraction of milk-girl and young farm-hand, as morning and evening they saw to the herd of cows. Everything was settled and the day fixed, when they quarrelled; Mollie would not move without her old mother, Tom could not be parted from his. There was no room for the two old women in his little cabin, even if there had been the faintest hope of their agreeing, and there was none. Bid Naylan did not come to pour oil upon the troubled waters; there were others fanning the smouldering dispute to flame with the fuel of well intentioned interference. So much so that one soft spring evening Tom and Mollie met by the shores of the lake and parted for ever, Mollie shrilling angry words, Tom, having spent his anger, standing dejectedly.
