Summer legal aid project offers help and advice

By MIKE CASEY

The Faculty of Law and the Law Club has offered legicare to persons who have difficulty obtaining legal aid.

A student-run legal aid project this summer sent two law students, Rolly Laing and Donna Koziak, into the Boyle Street area to serve as legal counsel to residents.

The committee involved with the project outlined in its report three general objects for the pilot-project phase: (1) to help residents contact existing sources of legal aid and other help; to provide actual legal aid and advice. (2) to increase awareness among residents of their situation as citizens, particularly regarding the law. (3) to analyse legislation insofar as its effectiveness is concerned and to suggest changes in existing legislation or new legislation where deemed necessary.

To carry these objectives forward, two research assistantships were provided through the Law Faculty which enabled the two students to begin work in the area during the summer months. After office space was obtained in a central location, it then became the task of the workers to proceed with the pilot project phase, determining if there existed a need in the Boyle Street area which law students could help fill.

Personal contact was emphasized, and the students acted as personal counselors to their many clients.

If a situation arose requiring legal advice, the problem was researched by the workers and the advice to be given was then checked over by a professor from the Law School.

In the event that the problem could be looked after by an existing agency, the client was referred to that agency.

Numerous telephone calls for information were handled in this way once the facts had been sorted out.

In a large number of the cases dealt with, the inquirer needed only to have his problem properly defined to make the solution apparent.

In the majority of cases, the workers were able to take direct and positive action.

The students' report said "the idea of the project was very successful in the area, and the residents came to feel that they could ask the questions they had waited so long to ask and the workers had the time to provide the answers and spend a little time explaining the reasons behind the answers."

The committee is convinced the benefits to the profession, the students, and society all prove the value of the Student Legal Services Project, and plans for the continuation of the project during the school term are under consideration.
